19th December 1572.—"At the said court, motion made, for the naming of certain persons of this company to be feoffees of trust to receive the lands of the Lady Laxton, which Sir William Laxton bequeathed to them for the maintenance of a free school in Oundle in Northamptonshire, from the which lands the Lady Laxton is content presently to depart, having estate in the same for the term of her life. And it was agreed that Sir J—— White and others shall be feoffees to receive the said lands to the use aforesaid."

13th March 1572.—"At the aforesaid court, motion was made, of request made by the Lady Laxton, to grant Sir Thomas Lodge a lease of a house, wherein he dwelleth in Cornhill for twenty-one years, upon consideration that she will presently release the lands to this company for maintenance of a free school in Oundle in the county of Northampton, wherein she is entitled for the term of her life; and at this instant, came Sir Thomas Lodge himself and brought the book which was drawn between the said Lady Laxton and the company, declaring that my lady is content that the book shall pass, and that the company shall, from the Annunciation of Our Lady next, enjoy the lands appointed to them by the will of Sir William Laxton, and be charged, within as convenient time as the com-[535]-pany may, to erect, establish, and maintain the said school and seven poor almsmen, and all other things, according to the tenor and true meaning of the same Sir William Laxton his will. And after he had delivered the said book, he declared, that forasmuch as he hath already received friendship at this company's hands, he is ashamed to receive anything of the same; nevertheless, if it would please them, at the request of the said Dame Johane Laxton, to grant him a lease of the house he dwelleth in, he would take it very thankfully at their hands, and think himself much bound to them for the good-wills therein; whose suit being heard, and consideration thereof had, he was answered, that he needeth not to have any mistrust in the company, for they do not mind to put him out of the house, though his lease was expired, and other answer they were not determined to make therein, and as for the book, they do agree and order that it shall be engrossed and sealed, and the company, by the feoffees, seized of the lands, according to the tenor of the said book, that Mr. Wardens shall, as conveniently and as speedily as they can, settle the school and almsmen, in such order as is limited in the will of Sir William Laxton."

12th June 1573.—"First, at this court, was read the proceedings and order taken by Mr. Wardens at Oundle, concerning the establishing of the schoolhouse, schoolmaster, usher, and seven poor men there, viz.:—Upon the 3d day of June last, possession was taken by Mr. Owenshaw and Mr. Hawke, being two of the feoffees thereunto appointed, of the schoolhouse, a house for the schoolmaster and another for the usher, according to a deed of feoffment made by Dame Johane Laxton, which was done in the presence of a great number of the town of Oundle, both old and young; and there was given to forty-eight scholars a penny a-[536]-piece, to the intent they should the better remember Mr. Wardens being at Oundle about the said possession. And there was also given to five poor women there, before now placed by the Lady Laxton and now removed to place men there, to each of them, twelvepence."

The expences to which the company were put about these matters were, apparently, paid by them out of their private monies.

When the company took possession of the property in 1573, the rental amounted to about £50 per annum. The sums specified in the testator's codicil amounted to £38 which was paid by the company, and the surplus, from the commencement of the charity, was retained by them. In 1577 John Wanton (who was assumed to be the then heir), made some claim to the property. He represented to the company, that he was entitled, as his counsel did declare unto him, to the lands, &c.; yet, to avoid suit in law, he proposed that four councillors, two to be chosen by each party, should declare their opinions on the same. What became of this claim did not appear, but in the following year (1578), the company increased the salaries of the schoolmaster and usher by "benevolences" of £6, 3s. 4d. and £3, 6s. 8d. each respectively. The company continued to receive the increased rents, and after making payments to the charity with some augmentation, retained the surplus.

At the great fire of London in 1666, this together with other property of the company, was destroyed, and they became considerably indebted.

By a decree of charitable uses issued under the 43 Eliz. c. 4, after reciting an inquisition whereby the [537] jurors found amongst others, the particulars of this property which was charged by Sir William Laxton with the charitable payments amounting to £38, and that the company did think fit to augment during their pleasure (shewing the payments to amount to £102, 16s., and that they were willing in future to pay £82, 16s.), and that their whole estate should be charged with the arrears of this and the other charities; it was ordered, that all the real estate of the company should stand charged with all the growing charitable uses and the arrears, and should be conveyed to trustees for that purpose, and in consideration of the impoverished state of the company, twenty years was given them for the payment of the arrears.

Their whole estate, including that of Sir William Laxton, was accordingly conveyed to trustees to pay the charities mentioned in the schedule. In the schedule the rental of the Laxton estates then appeared to be £167, and the payments directed to be made were £82, 16s. only.

The estate had since come back to the company, and the gross rental had increased to £1500 a year, and the company had also a sum of £8645 consols, which had arisen from the sale of part of the charity estate under the London Bridge Act.

Of the present income, the company applied about £300 a year only to the purposes of the charity, and retained the remainder.

This information sought a declaration that the whole income of the property was applicable to the purposes of the charity, and for a scheme, having a more extended system of education, under the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 77.

[538] The Defendants, by their answer, claimed to be entitled to appropriate the surplus income beyond the payments made by them, to their own use.

Mr. G. Turner and Mr. Collins, in support of the information. The rule of the Court, as laid down in The Attorney-General v. The Drapers' Company (2 Beav. p. 511) in conformity with the prior decisions, is this, that in every case where the general purpose of a gift or conveyance is declared to be a charity, and the particular payments do not exhaust the whole fund any surplus will belong to the charity, unless there are other circumstances, from which a contrary intention of the testator can be collected." (2 Beav. p. 511.)

So in The Attorney-General v. The Coopers' Company (3 Beav. p. 34), the rule again thus stated, "that if the testator clearly declares an intention of devoting the whole income of a property to charitable purposes, then, although he does not specifically directing the application of portions of it, exhaust the whole income, at the general intention that the whole shall be applied to charitable purposes will prevail; and on the other hand, although he does not make any such general declaration of devoting the whole to charity, but gives each and every portion of the whole income at the time, to some charitable purposes, and by that means exhausts the whole, then, if the income should afterwards increase, the increase will also be applicable to charitable purposes."

The whole intention of the testator was charity, and there is not, upon the evidence, the slightest trace of an [539] intention to benefit the Grocers' Company. The testator says, he was "fully minded to erect and found a grammar school," and that the schoolmaster and usher should have a particular stipend, and his "whole mind and intent was to have seven poor men perpetually to be found," &c.; and he recites that for the said godly intent, he had taken order and agreed with the Grocers' Company, and that he had set out unto them certain lands; but for what purpose? "As well for the payment of the stipends aforesaid appointed to the said schoolmaster and usher, and of the poor men, and also for the reparation and maintenance of the guild, and then he, "minding the accomplishment of all the premises, and have the same take effect according to his full mind and intent," devises, &c., to the Defendants upon condition and intent, &c. In this there is no trace of any declaration of giving a benefit to the company, but merely an intention to provide for the maintenance, in perpetuity, of the different objects of his charity.

The words "upon condition and to the intent," import no beneficial gift, as in The Attorney-General v. The Cordwainers' Company (3 Myl. & K. 534), but a mere trust; for the payments were to be, "out of the rents and reversions" of the premises, and not out of the Defendants' own revenues, and the words "upon condition" were used in The Attorney-General v. The Coopers' Company (3 Beav. 30), although there was a gift over, still the Court did not consider the Coopers' Company entitled to the whole increased rents.

The loss of the patronage of the school and charity, is a penalty sufficient to answer the "condition." The [540] testator authorises his executrix and overseers to do all things necessary "touching the erection and continuance of the said free school." Again; from the circumstances and especially the accounts, the reasonable presumption is, that the specified payments exhausted the whole income at the time.

The entries in the Defendants' books shew no claim of any beneficial interest, but that they took the property merely for the purposes of the charity.

The decrees did not, and could not alter the rights of the charity, which was not represented; the whole object of those proceedings was to give time for the payment of the arrears. The Commissioners had no authority to alter the foundation, and if the decree did make an alteration, it must now be reviewed. The Attorney-General v. The Grocers' Company (1 Keen, 506), Hynshaw v. The Corporation of Morpeth (Duke's Charitable Uses, 242). Usage, however large, cannot alter the rights of the charity apparent on the codicil, for trustees cannot acquire a right against the charity by a continued wrongful application of charity property.

The Attorney-General v. Wilson (3 Myl. & K. 362), The Attorney-General v. The Skimmers' Company (2 Russ. 407), The Attorney-General v. The Painter Stainers' Company (2 Cox. 51), were also referred to during the argument.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh, Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Bacon, contra. First, upon the codicil alone, there appears no devotion of the whole rents to the charity, but an intention that the specified fixed payments should be made. The [541] devise is not "in trust" as in The Attorney-General v. The Drapers' Company (2 Beav. 508), but "upon condition," an obligation was therefore imposed on the Grocers' Company to make the specified payments, and which was to be enforced by the "condition," rendering them liable to a forfeiture on the non-performance of the "mind, will, and intent" of the testator, to have the specified payments made to the several objects pointed out by him. In The Attorney-General v. The Cordwainers' Company (3 Myl. & K. 534) a condition, giving over the property on non-performance of his will by making certain fixed payments, was considered as implying a benefit to the Cordwainers' Company, who were held entitled to the surplus. Sir John Leach, in giving judgment in that case says, "The imposition of a penalty for non-performance of the condition, implies a benefit if the condition be performed, and is inconsistent with any other intention, than that the testator meant to give a beneficial interest to the company upon the terms of complying with the directions contained in his will. There is, therefore, no trust either express or implied for charitable purposes further than to the extent of the special charge imposed; and, upon all the principles applied in this Court to such a case, this information must be dismissed." It does not appear that the fixed payments exhausted the whole rents, the surplus was therefore intended for the benefit of the Grocers' Company for their pains and trouble, and to whom nothing else was given by the will of the testator. The Attorney-General v. The Corporation of Bristol (2 Jac. & W. p. 319), The Attorney-General v. Brazen Nose College (8 Bli. 377; 2 Cl. & Fin. 295).

[542] Secondly. It is clear that the codicil is not the origin and foundation of the charity. It is plain, from the codicil, that there had been some previous arrangement and bargain between the testator and the Grocers' Company. He says, "And whereas, for the said godly intent and purpose, I have taken order, and it is agreed between me and the wardens, &c., of grocers, and have set out unto them in particular, certain lands," &c. If, at this distance of time the terms cannot be proved, they must be collected from the continued usage since the death of the testator.

The entries in the Defendants' books shew, that from the death of the testator the company considered they had a beneficial interest in the property. Immediately after the testator's death, it was moved "whether they would take upon themselves the said lands, to the intent aforesaid or not;" they directed them to be viewed, and an inquiry of "what years were granted of the same lands, and when the same shall expire." They declare themselves willing to receive the same, "and perform the will" and "received the same, with thanksgiving for his genteel remembrance;" and they direct all the expences relating thereto, and to the litigation with the heir to be paid out of the "goods of the house."

Thirdly. The continued usage adopted from the very commencement, shews distinctly the terms on which the company undertook the management of the charity. Long usage has always been considered as affording evidence of the terms on which charity estates are held. The Attorney-General v. Catherine Hall (Jacob, 381), The Attorney-General v. Caius College (2 Keen, 150), The Attorney-General v. Brazen Nose College (2 Cl. & Fin. 295). Here from the hour the De-[543]-fendants took possession, the payments have never corresponded with the rental; the expenses and deficiencies have been supplied from their private funds, and the surplus has, from that day to the present, been appropriated by the Defendants to their own use, notwithstanding the adverse claims of the heir and the litigation which ensued.

Fourthly, the rights have been determined by the decree of the Commissioners and this Court has no authority to alter or reverse it.

Mr. Lloyd, for the schoolmaster.

Mr. Turner, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The sums directed to be applied are, beyond all doubt, certain and definite sums; however, in support of the information, it is contended, that the testator, by his codicil, intended the whole revenue of the property to be applied to the charitable purposes mentioned in the codicil, while, on behalf of the Grocers' Company it is argued, that there is no such general intention to be collected from the documents, and that he intended these particular sums only to be applied to the charitable purposes.

It is perfectly clear that this codicil was made after previous consideration by the testator. For effectuating his purpose, he was desirous of obtaining from the Crown a particular house, in which he wished the school to be established, and the poor bedesmen to dwell. It further appears, that he must have had some previous communication with the company respecting this matter, because he mentions in his codicil that it had been [544] agreed to the effect there stated, and that for the purpose of his intended bounty, he had set out certain property for the payments of the stipends, &c.

It appears from the evidence, that from the time the company obtained possession of the property down to the present time, they have never, at any period (unless it were at the period immediately following the great fire of London), applied the whole of the income derived from this property for the purposes of that charity.

I quite agree, that where a charitable trust has been established, a departure from that trust, continued for a great length of time, is not, merely from the length of time, to be considered as legally justified, but length of time is nevertheless a circumstance which is always very material to be taken into consideration, and may have different weight attached to it, according to the circumstances which have taken place. As public bodies of this nature are under no obligation to accept trusts of this kind, something which may be very material may take place at the time of the acceptance of the trust. It was so considered by Lord Eldon on more than one occasion. (See Jacob, 381; and see ante, p. 386.) On the other hand, the circumstances may shew, that although the strict directions of the trust have never been properly observed, yet that there never has been a sufficient cause or warrant for deviating from it. In that case, length of time cannot be used as any foundation for an adverse right.

In this case, however, taking simply the fact, that there never has been an application of the rents to this charity, conformable to the allegation made in this information, that the whole rent belonged to the charity, [545] we must look narrowly to the terms of the codicil, and also to the circumstances which took place at the time when the company obtained possession of the trust.

The circumstances which then took place are involved in a great degree of obscurity. The disputes which took place immediately after the death of the testator shew, that the proceedings of the company were noticed and watched by persons who had an interest to do so, by Lady Laxton, who was giving up her life interest for the purposes of the charity, by the heir at law of the testator, who claimed adversely to the company, and also by the officers of the Crown, from whom the schoolhouse was to be obtained. Under these circumstances we find the company apply less than the full amount of the rents for the purposes of this charity. I do not certainly mean to say that this would, of itself, be sufficient to shew the title of the company, if the words of the codicil were clearly the other way.

Let us consider what is the rule of the Court under these circumstances, and how does that rule apply? It is one fortunate result from the number of these cases which have recently come before the Court, that there is now no dispute as to the general rule. It is now clearly admitted, that if the will be so expressed as to attach a charitable trust to the whole property, then, however deficient may be the appropriation of the whole amount of the rent, still the whole income will be subject to the charity, because it is to be applied according to a trust which extends to the whole of the property.

It comes therefore to this, does this codicil, by the words of it, attach a trust to the whole property? The cases which have been cited have been something to this effect:—The property has been given “on the trusts [546] after mentioned” or “to the intent” that the devisees do so and so. Some general words have occurred, either in the beginning of the will, before the charitable purposes are stated, or, as in a case which was referred to (I think before Lord Thurlow), where certain specific sums are directed to be applied, and then general words follow, shewing it was the intention of the testator to apply the whole to charitable purposes. In such cases, whatever may be the amount of the rents or revenues of the property, and however they may exceed the particular stated applications directed by the will, the whole must be applied to charity.

I do not find in this codicil any statement that the whole of this property is to be applied to the purposes of the charity. What I find is, that the testator intended to establish a school and to have an establishment for his bedesmen. He intended to establish a school for ever, to be called Sir William Laxton's Free Grammar School; his “mind, will, and intent” was that the schoolmaster should have for his stipend £18 a year, and the usher £6, 13s. 4d. a year; his “mind, will, and intent” was that the seven poor men should have each of them 8d. weekly towards their maintenance and relief, and also lodging and dwelling. Those were the things which he was minded to do. After speaking of his agreement with the company, he says that he had set out certain of his lands. Why? “As well for the payment of the stipends aforesaid appropriated to the said schoolmaster and usher, and for the poor men, as also for the repairs and maintenance of the said messuage or tenement.” So that the messuage or tenement was to be obtained from the Crown, to be used for the school and bedesmen; and then he has set out these lands, as well for the payment of these stipends, as for the reparation of the messuage to be obtained from the Crown. He then makes [547] the devise, “upon the condition and intent” that they should apply for the house, and then they were to provide a schoolmaster and usher, and make payment of the particular sums to them and to the seven poor men. I confess I do not think, amongst the various cases which have been before the Court at different periods, in which it has been argued, from the words of the bequest, that there was a charitable purpose applying to the whole property, there has been any case which has been so deficient of proper words for that purpose as the present. The purpose he had in view was a school and seven almsmen: to effect that purpose he provided fixed salaries, and provided a certain sum for repairs; and then he seems to have done with the matter, with the exception of something else which occurs at the end of this codicil.

I cannot take into my consideration, that if it had been suggested to the testator, at the time he was making his codicil, that the time might very likely come when the revenues would greatly increase, and when the fixed salary would be insufficient for the maintenance of the schoolmaster, he would have made provision for these cases. I have no right to do so. All I can do is to look at the words of his will for the purpose of seeing what is the intention there declared, and if I find the intention there declared to be such as not to affect the whole of the property, but to direct the application of particular sums only to the charity, I cannot extend it.

It is said (and so it would appear from the time when the will was afterwards proved) that the testator was dying, and that he had very little time fully to explain the matter. He says, “I will that for lack of convenient time further to explain,” &c. Now he had fixed the sums, and he had fixed the place. If he had desired [548] all these matters to be left open, everything to be left open, he would have said, “I leave this property for the purpose; I have not time to settle what ought to be done with particular parts of it, or what expenses ought to be allowed. I must leave that to be settled by my executrix and overseers." Many such wills have been before the Court, where charitable dispositions have been made at a time when a scheme could not be settled, and it has been left to the Court to devise a scheme for the purpose, which it has often been under the necessity of doing: but here he says the purpose is a school, and the means of maintaining the school is to provide that building, and to provide these specified salaries. If there be any other thing, which other thing must mean the regulations of the school, those are to be settled afterwards.

Upon the best consideration I can give to this case, I am of opinion, that there is not in this codicil, a general devotion of the whole property to the charitable purpose in question; and I do not think there was an error in the non-application of the whole of this revenue, from time to time, to the purposes of the charity.

It seems that after the foundation of the charity the company did, from time to time, augment the salaries. In that they did what appears to me to have been perfectly right; but I cannot agree with the argument which has been suggested to me, that this ought to be considered as evidence that they thought themselves under an obligation to do it. Though there was no legal obligation, still there was what may be called a moral obligation upon them. Having received property which has turned out of a much greater value than was expected by this testator, and the purpose for which he gave it to them being, that they should maintain this [549] charity in the way he had pointed out, it certainly may be considered as a moral duty on their part, when they found the revenues greatly increased, and the fixed payments had become manifestly insufficient to keep up the charity in an effectual manner, to make a fit and proper augmentation. It was quite right in them so to do; but I cannot consider the fact of their having done so, as evidence that they considered themselves to be, and still less as evidence that they were, subject to a legal obligation to do it.

I do not think that the decree of the Commissioners of Charitable Uses amounts to a declaration of right; it does seem to me to assume that which I think was right, and takes for granted that the Grocers' Company were entitled to the property, subject to the fixed payments. That is found by the jurors before whom the inquiry was taken, and the decree seems to me to assume it, though it does not, after investigation and discussion, declare the right.

It is material to observe, that before the Commissioners, the company professed themselves to be willing to pay a larger sum than that which by the codicil they were bound to pay, and time was thereupon given to them to pay the arrears. I think I ought to consider the company bound to pay those increased sums, because it was by the submission to pay those sums that they got an extension of time.

This information asks, that whatever sum may be found to belong to this school, some directions should be given for a scheme by which a larger instruction may be given to those boys who are entitled to the benefit of this school; and it is said that the Grammar School Act makes it proper so to do.

[550] The argument, which certainly was conducted with very great ingenuity, has taken this shape. It is said the charity may not be entitled to the whole of this fund; yet it turns out that the present fixed payments are not sufficient to maintain a proper school, or to pay the salaries of the schoolmaster and usher of a grammar school: then, as it was, clearly, the primary intention of the testator that a grammar school should be maintained, that purpose ought not to fail, by the accident of these fixed salaries turning out, in the course of time, to be insufficient for the purpose. That the Court may therefore consider, in the first instance, what would be a proper sum to pay for the maintenance of such a grammar school as would effectually answer the intention which the testator had in view, and that may be a sum very considerably larger than that which he allowed, and that sum being ascertained, then, by the authority of the Grammar School Act, it may be applied in the maintenance of a school affording the general instruction pointed out by that Act.

This might be very well, provided you were not encroaching upon a revenue, which, according to the construction which, it appears to me, ought to be put on this codicil, belongs, as private property, to this company. If the testator has fixed on certain salaries which fail to provide for the fulfilment of his intention, no doubt it is very much to be regretted : but you cannot, at the expense of the company, to whom the testator has given a beneficial interest, take that interest from them, upon the notion that the testator, if he had thought better of the matter, would have assigned a larger sum to the charity, or upon the notion that the Legislature has interfered as against the interest of that party to provide a school where there may be a larger instruction.

[551] I apprehend that the Grammar School Act can have no application to any case whatever, except where there are certain revenues appropriated to the instruction there pointed out. If there be a certain amount of revenue devoted to a school, and that school has, by the testator, been called a grammar school, and you cannot apply that fund beneficially for the instruction of boys in grammar, in consequence of the situation in which the school is placed, the change of circumstances, and so on, the Court may then apply that amount to a more general subject of education ; but it cannot obtain a further fund for the purposes of general education by encroaching on the private right of another party.

I do not therefore at present quite see my way towards making any order on that subject ; I do not think I can make any order.

The information must be dismissed, with costs.

[552] TYLEE v. WEBB. June 27, 28, July 8, 1843.

[See Hewitt v. Loosemore, 1851, 9 Hare, 457.]

A. mortgaged copyholds to B. by a deposit of a copy of his admission. A. died, and his heir mortgaged them to C. by a deposit of a copy of his own admission. C. afterwards sold and conveyed the estate to D. D. had notice of B.'s security. Held, that it was unnecessary to determine whether C. took with notice of B.'s incumbrance, as by the deposit he could take only such interest as the heir could give, namely, his interest subject to the equitable charge of the ancestor ; and, secondly, that the conveyance to D. was void as against B.

In 1829 A. was admitted to a copyhold, and in 1832 he deposited the copy of his admission with B. as a security. In 1837 A.'s heir, after admission, attempted to sell the property without effect. C. acted therein as his attorney, and D. as the clerk of C. On the 20th of July 1837 A.'s heir mortgaged the property to C., by deposit of his own admission. In this transaction D. acted as the agent and clerk of C., and as the agent of the heir. It appeared that in November 1835 D. had notice of B.'s incumbrance, and that on the 19th of July 1837 D. knew that the produce of the sale was to be applied in discharge of B.'s demand. Held, that the knowledge which D. possessed in November 1835 could not be imputed to C. in 1837. Secondly, that D.'s knowledge in July 1837 that the proceeds of the sale were to be applied in discharge of B.'s demand, did not clearly shew, that even he, at that time, recollected or knew that which he had known in November 1835 ; and thirdly, semble, that C., who knew that the party from whom he took it had been admitted only as heir and that the ancestor had been admitted under copy of court roll, dated in 1829, must be deemed that the ancestor, having the copy of court roll, might have created an equitable mortgage by deposit, and consequently that C. ought to have required its production before he advanced his money.

The facts of this case are fully stated in the judgment ; it is therefore unnecessary further to repeat them.

July 8. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. This is a bill filed by equitable mortgagees for a foreclosure of the mortgaged estate, against another equitable mortgagee, a purchaser who obtained the legal estate, and a legal mortgagee under the purchaser.

In the month of December 1829 Robert Webb, being about to purchase a copyhold estate, borrowed the sum of £150, and as a security for the repayment, gave to the Plaintiffs a promissory note, and signed an agreement for the deposit, of what was called the deeds of the premises, as soon as the same should be made out and in his lawful possession.

Robert Webb, having been admitted tenant of the premises, received a copy of the court rolls of the [554] manor of which the premises were held. The copy was dated the 18th of December 1829, and on the 12th of July 1832 he placed it in the hands of the Plaintiffs, with a declaration in writing signed by him, and which was in these words:—

“Bristol, July 12th, 1832.—I do hereby declare, that the deeds annexed hereto left in the possession of Messrs. J. & T. Tylee, are as a security for an amount of £150, which I am indebted to said firm for cash advanced, and for which, interest at 5 per cent. per annum I agree to pay; and they are duly authorised to hold the same until the said amount of £150 and interest shall be fully paid.

“ROBERT WEBB.”

Under these circumstances, the Plaintiffs became equitable mortgagees of the copyhold estate in question.

Robert Webb died intestate on the 13th of October 1832, leaving the Defendant Thomas Webb, his customary heir, and, as such, entitled to the estate, subject to the Plaintiffs' equitable mortgage; and on the 7th of November 1833 Thomas Webb, as the heir of Robert, procured himself to be admitted tenant of the estate, and a new copy of court roll was granted to him. He paid the interest of £150 to the Plaintiffs up to October 1834; and if it be true, as has been said, that he thought he was paying interest on £150 secured by a promissory note, and was not, at first, aware of the equitable mortgage, the fact becomes immaterial, because it is proved that on the 10th of April 1837 he had distinct notice of the mortgage. He had the legal estate, the copy of the roll shewing his own admittance, and notice that the copy of the roll shewing the admittance [555] of his father, as whose heir he claimed, was in the hands of the Plaintiffs as equitable mortgagees.

Thomas Webb made an attempt to sell the estate by auction in the month of July 1837. The Defendant Mr. Hinton was the solicitor employed to effect the sale, and his clerk Battiscombe took an active part in the business; a sale was not effected, and consequently Thomas Webb was desirous to raise an additional sum by way of loan, and Mr. Hinton was induced to lend him £50 on a deposit of a copy of court roll and his own admittance.

A question is raised, whether, at the time of this advance, Mr. Hinton had, or ought to be deemed to have had, notice of the Plaintiffs' equitable mortgage.

It appears, by a letter which was written by Battiscombe to Kelly (an agent of the Plaintiffs) on the 30th of November 1835, that Battiscombe then knew, from the information of Webb, that the Plaintiffs had a security on the premises; and further, by a letter which was written by Battiscombe to Webb on the 19th of July 1837, that Battiscombe then knew that the proceeds of the then intended sale were to be applied in discharge of the Plaintiffs' demand, and on the occasion of Hinton's loan, Battiscombe acted not only as his agent and clerk, but also as the agent of Webb, of whom he seems to have been a particular friend; and for the security of Hinton, Battiscombe sent to Webb for his signature, a memorandum of agreement, dated the 20th of July 1837, and which Webb afterwards signed, whereby it was stated, that Webb had deposited with Hinton, a copy of court roll, dated the 7th of November 1833, stating that at a court held on that day, he, as the only son and heir of Robert Webb, who held, by virtue of a copy of [556] court roll, dated the 18th of December 1829, the estate in question, to which Thomas Webb claimed to be entitled as only son and heir of Robert, and that he was admitted tenant of the estate, and had deposited the copy of court roll as security for the £50 advanced by Hinton, and interest.

It does not appear to me that the knowledge which Battiscombe possessed in November 1835 can be imputed to Hinton in 1837, or that Battiscombe's knowledge, in July 1837, that the proceeds of the sale were intended to be applied in discharge of the Plaintiffs' demand, clearly shews, that even he, at that time, recollected or knew that which he had known in November 1835; and though I incline to think that Hinton, who knew that Thomas Webb had been admitted only in his character of heir of Robert Webb, and that Robert Webb had been admitted under copy of court roll, dated the 18th of December 1829, must be deemed to have known that Robert Webb, having that copy of court roll, might have deposited it so as to create an equitable charge upon the estate, and, consequently, ought to have required its production before he advanced his money, yet it does not appear to me to be necessary to determine whether Hinton had, or ought to be deemed to have had, at that time, notice of the Plaintiffs' right, for I think that under the circumstances, and by mere deposit of the son's copy of court roll, he could take only that which Webb the son could give, which was the interest he was entitled to as his father's heir, subject to the charge which his father had made: and however this may be, it is proved that in the early part of February 1838 Mr. Hinton had direct and distinct notice of the Plaintiffs' claim; and upon the evidence which is given, I am of opinion that the other Defendants, Wilson and Lloyd, must, throughout the transactions in which they are concerned, be deemed to [557] have had all the notice of the Plaintiffs' claim which Hinton had.

The estate having been sold to Wilson, whose mortgagee Lloyd is, and the purchase-money being now in the hands of Hinton, the Plaintiffs have, at the Bar, claimed to have the purchase-money applied, as far as it will extend, in satisfaction of their claims, and a right to proceed to foreclose the estate, if the residue of what may be due to them shall not be paid by the Defendants personally. No such claim is made by the bill, nor could it have been sustained. The Plaintiffs cannot have security upon both the estate itself, and the purchase-money which represents its value.

On the other hand, it has been objected, that the Plaintiffs have unnecessarily made some of the Defendants parties to the cause; but considering this as a bill of foreclosure, I think that every one of the Defendants was a necessary party, because each of them had a right to redeem.

On the whole, I am of opinion, that the Plaintiffs are entitled to have the ordinary decree for foreclosure of the equitable mortgage to which they are entitled.

I shall make the decree, unless the parties agree to confirm the sale, and to go against the purchase-money.

NOTE.—An appeal to the Lord Chancellor is pending.

[558] MARSHALL v. MELLERSH. March 25, 30, 1843.

A Plaintiff may call for information of a very minute character, which the Defendant is bound in duty to afford, yet he may do it in such a way as to amount to what is called impertinence, or prolixity amounting to impertinence.

Where a party is required to set forth information, and he refers to a book containing all that information, it will be impertinent for him afterwards to repeat the information contained in that book.

This case came before the Court upon exceptions for impertinence.

Henry Marshall and Thomas Mellersh carried on business as solicitors in partnership, under articles dated in 1817, and which expired in 1828. This bill was filed for taking an account of the partnership transactions. It alleged that many matters of business had been omitted in the books of account, and that the matters entered therein had not been fairly made out. The bill called upon the Defendant, in the most extensive terms, to set out a full, true, and particular account of the several accounts, receipts, matters, and things relating to the partnership.

The bill was not of any excessive length, but the second answer, which was put in after exceptions had been taken to the first, contained schedules comprising the several items of account, &c., of a very minute character, in consequence of which the answer exceeded 1400 folios in length.

Exceptions having been taken thereto, they were allowed by the Master, and the case now came before the Court upon exceptions to the Master's report. The circumstances, so far as they are necessary to explain the principle of the decision, are sufficiently detailed in the judgment of the Court.

The case was argued by [559] Mr. Turner and Mr. Freeling, for the Defendant; and by Mr. Pemberton Leigh and Mr. Dixon, for the Plaintiff.

The following cases were cited:—Tench v. Cheese (1 Beavan, 571), Byde v. Mademan (Cr. & Ph. p. 268), Alsager v. Johnson (4 Ves. 217), Norway v. Rowe (1 Mer. 347), Beaumont v. Beaumont (5 Mad. 51).

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I cannot look at this case without feeling the greatest regret that this species of litigation should be carried on between these parties, in a case, in which, after all, the question is merely one of partnership account.

The Plaintiff is in possession, and, it would appear, has been in possession, if not of the whole, at least of a very great part of the information in respect of which he has, by this bill, sought very minute and detailed discovery. It seems that he is in possession of partnership books, which contain the entries relating to all those matters. Alleging, however, on his part, that those books do not contain all the entries relating to these matters, and alleging also, in substance, that some of the entries relating to those matters are not fairly made in the books, he calls upon the Defendant to set forth, minutely and particularly, the detailed accounts of the several things as to which he seeks discovery. He does not call upon the Defendant to set forth in what respect the accounts stated in the books are erroneous, but to set forth particularly all and every the particular items. Why he thought fit to adopt that course of proceeding, it is [560] certainly very difficult to conjecture. He possibly had some reason for it, and some reason for presenting his interrogatory in that very unlimited form.

The question for me to consider, upon these several exceptions, is, in the first place, whether the Plaintiff has called for the minute information which is given in these schedules, and if he has, then whether the Defendant has afforded it in a proper manner; because it may happen that a Plaintiff may call for information of a very minute character, which the Defendant is bound, in duty, to afford, yet he may do in such a way as to amount to what is here called impertinence, or prolixity amounting to impertinence.

The first exception before me relates to small expenses incurred by the Defendant and to receipts and payments made by him out of the partnership monies in respect of those expenses. The Master has sanctioned several parts of the information afforded by the Defendant in that respect, but he has not sanctioned that part which is not excepted to. Now if that part had been no more than a mere copy of so many folios of a particular book, where all the information was collected, it would have been subject to a consideration which the other exceptions may be subjected to; but, as I understand the case, the Defendant, in obtaining the information afforded by this schedule, has had to investigate several of the partnership books, for the purpose of collecting thereout the several items relating to this particular subject of inquiry. He has certainly done that with great minuteness. He has set forth a great number of very small sums: it might be, and I think it is called for by the words of the bill; it might be, and I think it is, from the nature of them, necessary for the case of the Defendant, that those particulars should be set forth; [561] and after all the argument which has occurred upon this subject, I cannot find that that part of the first schedule here referred to, is liable to the charge of impertinence, if it be not liable in respect of the constant repetition of the words "cash expenses."

I cannot help thinking that this might, by possibility, have been avoided. I think that, if some more pains and trouble had been bestowed upon the form of the schedule, it might have afforded to the Plaintiff all the information which he asked, and it might have afforded to the Defendant all the defence and protection which he was entitled to, if it had been shortened by some few words in the schedule; but I am by no means of opinion that I can or ought to consider the addition of these words, from time to time, in every line, was intended for oppression. I think that the words are unnecessary, but I do not think them irrelevant. They belong to the subject, and therefore I cannot allow that exception.

With regard to the second exception, which relates to the bankers' books, it appears that the Defendant is called upon to set forth, not merely the balances which are required in one of these interrogatories, but also what sums of money were, from time to time, paid into the bank, and by whom paid in, from time to time. The Defendant has, in one instance in his answer, referred to the bankers' pass-book, as containing the information which is required by that part of the bill, and has, for that purpose and by reference to it, made it a part of his answer. I think that if, after doing that, he had not been called upon, in another part of the bill, to give more information than is contained in the pass-book, he ought again to have referred to it, without setting forth the minute details. But if, as I understand it, he was, in the subsequent part [562] of the bill, called upon to set forth some information relating to those payments which was not in the pass-book, then, in addition to the reference to the pass-book, he was required to set forth something more to meet that subsequent requisition. Now with regard to that, it seems, that the pass-book contains no information as to the persons by whom the money was paid in for the first ten years of the account, and that the answer contains no more information than that which is in the pass-book, which in the previous part of the answer had been made a part of the answer. But in the subsequent part of the schedule, during the remaining ten or eleven years more, during which this partnership lasted, there are several items in the account, of sums paid in and out of the bank, with the names of the persons by whom they were paid in, that is, with information in addition to that which is contained in the pass-book, and which information therefore could not be afforded to the Plaintiff, who had required it, by a reference to the pass-book, and by making it a portion of the answer. It does appear to me, therefore, that this schedule is in part relevant, and necessary, and, therefore, not impertinent; but as to the other parts, that it is wholly unnecessary, in consequence of that book having been made a part of the answer. I must refer that part back to the Master to consider and review his report.

Upon the other exceptions, which relate to the bills of costs, the matter certainly does rest in a most strange position. These gentlemen were carrying on business as solicitors, and the charge is, that the business of the firm done by one partner has not been properly charged for, and, consequently, that the partnership has not had the benefit which it ought to have received, by a due remuneration given for the services done and performed by one of the parties. The bill books being [563] all in the hands of the Plaintiff, he had every means of knowing what charges were there made, and whether they were right or not. He had not, perhaps, the means of knowing, without inquiry of the Defendant, whether all the business which had been done by the Defendant had been brought into the account. That was a matter which might have been very properly inquired after, but that is not the discovery sought for by this interrogatory; for the bill, instead of charging and inquiring for that which was not contained in the bill books, and not contained in the partnership books, calls upon the Defendant to set forth a number of most minute particulars. It charges "that the Defendant ought to set forth a full, true, and particular account of all and every the purchases and sales of property, by or on behalf of Thomas Mellersh, which have been conducted and transacted by the partnership or at the partnership offices, or at the partnership expense; and all deeds, indentures, bonds, contracts, agreements, and other documents, prepared and engrossed by the partnership, or in the partnership offices, or at the partnership expense, for or on account of Thomas Mellersh, and on his private or separate account; and also of all actions, suits, indictments, and other proceedings at law and in equity, which have been had, commenced, prosecuted, defended, or conducted by the partnership, or at the partnership offices, or at the partnership expense; and the full, true, and utmost amount and value of all such business, matters, and things so done and performed, according to the usual rates of charge to the clients generally of the partnership; and of all entries made in all, or any, or either of the books of the partnership, or of James Limbert or of Thomas Mellersh, of or relating to such last-mentioned business, and in what instances, and for what reasons, any such entries were omitted to be made;” it seems to be an account of all entries [564] which were made, and the reasons why any such entries were omitted to be made, and whether Thomas Mellersh has ever paid or been charged with any and what sums for such business, or any and what part thereof, and if not, why not. The Defendant is called upon in the interrogatory very nearly in the same words, to set forth the full, true, and utmost amount and value of all such business, matters, and things so done and performed, according to the usual rates of charge to the clients generally of the partnership, and of all entries made in all, or any, or either of the books of the partnership, or of James Limbert, or of Thomas Mellersh, of or relating to such last-mentioned business, and in what instances, and for what reasons, any such entries were omitted to be made (which means, of course, any entries relating to such business which were omitted to be made). I am quite persuaded that this was not done upon a careful consideration of the matter, but words seem to have been thrown in, in such a way as to make it extremely difficult for the Defendant to deal with them.

In the answer to this interrogatory, the Defendant has set forth an exact copy of all the bills of costs which have been incurred in the several matters which are here referred to. He has stated the matters of business which were done, and then he has set forth an exact copy of all the bills of costs which relate to them. Now, however this interrogatory may be framed, that is not what is asked for: the Defendant was not asked for a copy of the bills of costs, but for a statement of business, matters, and things done and performed, and the utmost value of such several matters and things, according to the usual rates of charge. I confess I cannot find he was asked for an account of each item of all those matters. I therefore think that I shall be obliged to overrule those four exceptions.

[565] VANDALEUR v. BLAGRAVE. June, 29, 30, July 1, Nov. 6, 1843.

Double agency.

Grantor of an annuity entrusted Y. with a sum of money for the purpose of redeeming it. Y., without paying the money, obtained from the grantee a deed of release of the annuity. Y., who acted in some respects as agent of both parties, afterwards died insolvent. Held, under the particular circumstances, that the loss must be borne by the grantor.

The Defendant, through the agency of one Yates, granted to the Plaintiff an annuity, redeemable on six months' notice. In May 1830 notice was given to repurchase in November, and in August 1830 the Defendant entrusted Yates with the money for the repurchase. In October Yates prevailed on the Plaintiff to execute the deed of reassignment, dated in November and indorsed on the annuity deed, without receiving the repurchase-money, but the Plaintiff did not sign any receipt for the money. Yates afterwards produced the deed to the son of the Defendant, to satisfy him of the payment, and it was handed back to Yates to be kept by him with the Defendant's other documents. Yates acted in the transaction as agent of both parties. He retained the money, and to deceive both, continued the payment of the annuity, but afterwards died insolvent. The Defendant subsequently obtained possession of the deed. Held, under the circumstances, that the Defendant was not discharged, but was bound to pay to the Plaintiff the repurchase-money, with interest from November 1830, the Plaintiff accounting for the subsequent receipts of the annuity.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh, Mr. Kindersley, and Mr. Romilly, for the Plaintiff.

THE SOLICITOR-GENERAL, Mr. Tinney, and Mr. Tripp, for the principal Defendant.

Mr. Paynter, for a trustee.

Parnther v. Gaiskell (13 East, 432), Barker v. Greenwood (2 Y. & Col. 414), Stewart v. Aberdeen (4 Mee. & W. p. 218), Preston on Abstracts (vol. i. page 299). Kennedy v. Green (3 Myl. & K. 699), Johnson v. Baker (4 B. & Ald. 440), were cited.

Nov. 6. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. This bill prays, that an indenture of release and reassignment, dated the 16th of November 1830, may be declared to be fraudulent and void, and may be deli-[566]-vered up to be cancelled; and that the Defendant Mrs. Blagrove may be ordered to pay to the Plaintiff the sum of £2500, for the repurchase of the annuity of £500 in the pleadings mentioned, together with the arrears of the annuity, accrued or to accrue, till the time of the repurchase thereof; or that Mrs. Blagrove may pay to the Plaintiff all arrears and future payments of the same annuity, the Plaintiff offering to do what may be required of him in either case.

The annuity in question was granted by Mrs. Blagrove to the Plaintiff by indenture dated the 16th of November 1827. It was made payable to the Plaintiff during the life of Mrs. Blagrove, out of an annual rent charge of £800 to which she was entitled; and for the purpose of securing the payment of the annuity, the rent charge was assigned to the Plaintiff. Covenants for further assurance were entered into, and Mrs. Blagrove covenanted to do all reasonable acts to enable the Plaintiff to insure her life in respect of the annuity, and that a judgment, to be entered on record against Mrs. Blagrove at the suit of the Plaintiff, should be a further security.

It was further provided, that if the Defendant were desirous to repurchase the annuity, and should give six calendar months' previous notice, in writing, of her intention to the Plaintiff, or in lieu thereof, tender him £2500, the Plaintiff would, at the expiration of the six calendar months, and on receiving all arrears and costs, accept £2500 in full for the repurchase of the annuity, and would, thereupon, release or assign the same, and the rent charge of £800, and all other securities for the same, to Mrs. Blagrove, or as she should appoint, and would acknowledge satisfaction of the judgment, and would, on receiving from her a proportionable [567] part of any premiums paid, assign to her any policy of insurance effected upon her life in respect of the annuity.

A memorial of the deed was duly inrolled in this Court; and in pursuance of a warrant of attorney executed by Mrs. Blagrove, judgment was duly entered up against her, at the suit of the Plaintiff, in the Court of Queen's Bench, for the sum of £5000, and a policy of insurance in the Pelican Life Insurance Company was effected on her life, in the name of the Plaintiff, and on his behalf, for the sum of £2800.

In the year 1830 Mrs. Blagrove intended to redeem the annuity, and, for that purpose, to pay what was due to the Plaintiff, and at the same time, as it appears to me, the Plaintiff intended to receive what was due to him, and thereupon to release the annuity, and reassign the rent charge to Mrs. Blagrove.

The parties themselves acted in good faith, but Thomas Cooksey Yates, who acted as agent for them both, in the treaty for the annuity and on various other occasions, committed a gross fraud. Being intrusted with money belonging to Mrs. Blagrove sufficient to redeem the annuity, he was directed to redeem it; and having the money in his hands, but concealing that fact, he prevailed on the Plaintiff to execute a deed of release and reassignment, without receiving the money, but in the expectation of receiving it on a future day, and thus he contrived to keep the money in his own hands for his own purposes.

The money has in fact never been paid, but the deed which was executed by the Plaintiff has come into the hands of Mrs. Blagrove, and she now claims the benefit [568] of it. The questions in the cause are, whether the deed is valid and binding to any and what extent; whether the Plaintiff is to lose his annuity, although he has never received any consideration for its redemption, or whether Mrs. Blagrove is to continue subject to the annuity, although she directed her money in the hands of Yates to be applied for its redemption, or whether, in the result of the transaction, it ought to be held that there was a valid contract for the redemption of the annuity, which ought now to be carried into effect by payment of the redemption money and interest.

We must consider the relation between the parties and Mr. Yates, and their respective acts.

Mr. Yates was, or soon after the commencement of these transactions became, a barrister. He had been acquainted with and employed by the Plaintiff before the year 1827. In September 1827 he was first introduced by Mrs. Blagrove and her son Anthony, in whom she appears to have placed, and still to place, implicit confidence, and being then informed that Mrs. Blagrove was in want of money, he informed her, that the Plaintiff would probably assist her with a loan of £2500. This communication led to the treaty for the grant of the annuity, and Mr. Yates was intrusted by both parties with the management of the transaction.

From the date of the deed in November 1827 till December 1832, the Defendant employed Mr. Yates in various transactions: he advised her as a lawyer, he received and paid money for her, as her agent, to a very large amount, and her deeds, securities, and papers were placed in his hands.

[569] And the Plaintiff instructed him to hold the deed of the 16th of November 1827 on his behalf, to receive the annuity for him, and to pay the premiums of insurance thereout, and also employed him in some other transactions, and, as it appears, placed great confidence in him.

Till the month of May 1830, the annuity was paid to the Plaintiff by Mrs. Blagrove through Yates, who having thereout paid the premiums of insurance, together with any other sums which the Plaintiff might have authorised, accounted with the Plaintiff for the surplus.

In the month of May 1830 Mrs. Blagrove, expecting to receive money with which the annuity might be redeemed, it is said (and as the Plaintiff states it in his bill, I must, as against him, take the fact so to be), that Yates, as her agent, and on her behalf, gave notice to the Plaintiff, that it was her intention to repurchase the annuity in the following month of November; and before the time of redemption arrived, viz., in July 1830, Mrs. Blagrove's son, Anthony, who acted for her, inquired of Yates what sum would be necessary for the redemption of the annuity, and for some other purposes, and having ascertained the amount, he says that he paid the same to Yates for the express purpose, amongst other things, of releasing the annuity.

Yates having the money, or having money belonging to Mrs. Blagrove sufficient for the purpose, and having in his possession the deed of the 16th of November 1827, caused to be indorsed upon that deed a deed purporting to bear date the 16th of November 1830. This is the deed now in question, and it purports to witness, that in consideration of £2500 then paid, the Plaintiff [570] released the annuity of £500, and reassigned the rent charge of £800 to Mrs. Blagrove, and assigned to her the policy of insurance.

On the 11th of October 1830 the Plaintiff was at Carass in Ireland, and Yates came to him there with the indorsed deed so prepared. The Plaintiff now alleges, that Yates, so far from stating that he had received the redemption money from Mrs. Blagrove, pretended that he had not; that she had, indeed, meant to redeem the annuity by money to be raised by the sale of stock, but as the price of stocks had fallen, she wished for some delay, in the hope that the price would rise again; and that, thereupon, Yates assured the Plaintiff, that if he would execute the deed of reassignment, Yates would retain it in his own custody, until the £2500 should be paid to him by Mrs. Blagrove, for the Plaintiff; and that the Plaintiff, relying on the integrity of Yates, did accordingly execute and deliver to him the deed of reassignment, but that as no money was then paid, the Plaintiff did not assign any receipt for the £2500.

It appears from the evidence of Sir David Roche, who was present during the interviews between the Plaintiff and Yates on the 11th of October 1830, that Yates at first said, that he had come to pay off the money and to redeem the annuity, and that the Plaintiff then complained of having so large a sum of money thrown upon his hands, without notice of paying it off, and asked the advice of the witness as to how he should act; and that the witness thereupon asked Yates, whether he had the money with him, or why he was in such haste; to which Yates answered, that he had not the money, but that it was in the English funds, and that Mrs. Blagrove was getting only $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. besides in-[571]-surance, and would not continue to do so. The witness then advised the Plaintiff to insist on six months' notice; to which Yates objected, and said, that notice was mere matter of courtesy; that he had brought over the deeds of assignment to get the annuity reconveyed, and that, as soon as he took them back, the money would be sent over.

It is to be observed, on this evidence, that the Plaintiff appears to have insisted, that he had received no notice of Mrs. Blagrove's intention to redeem the annuity. By his bill he states that notice was given in May. Mr. Anthony Blagrove, in his evidence for the Defendant, says, that the notice was given by a letter which he wrote to Yates, requesting him to give notice to the Plaintiff, and that, as he best recollects, the notice was given in July.

There is thus some obscurity about the notice, for notice in July to redeem in November would not have been valid; but admitting, because the bill so states it, that a valid notice was given in May, the time for redemption did not arrive till November. It was not till the 16th of November that the Plaintiff, if not offered interest in anticipation (of which there is no evidence), was bound to receive the principal sum and release the annuity; and, therefore, having regard to the notice now admitted, the Plaintiff might reasonably complain, that he was asked to take the money too soon; and, further, it is to be observed, that the deed which was executed in October, was made to bear date on the 16th of November, and was acknowledged to be executed, in consideration of money paid at or before the sealing and delivery thereof. This was false; the deed was executed, but no money was paid, no receipt was signed, [572] and in this state of things, the deed was placed in the hands of Yates.

Yates, having the money of Mrs. Blagrove, ought to have paid it to the Plaintiff, upon the execution of the deed at the proper time; and having got the executed deed into his hands, he ought not to have parted with it till the Plaintiff had received the money.

Anthony Blagrove states, in his evidence, that he had an interview with Yates at Bristol, immediately after Yates returned from a visit to the Plaintiff in Ireland; that Yates then told him that he had paid £2750 for the repurchase of the annuity, and produced to him the deed of release, and, to the best of his recollection, a warrant of attorney; that these instruments were produced, for the purpose of satisfying him (the witness) that Yates had repurchased the annuity; and that the deed having been delivered to him, he gave it back to Yates, to be kept by him with the other documents of Mrs. Blagrove.

After the occurrence to which this evidence relates, we find, on the one side, that the Plaintiff fully expected the money to be paid; for on the 17th of November 1830 he wrote to Yates, desiring him to invest it in Irish 3 per cent. consols; but Yates afterwards represented to him, that the money was not paid, and that the annuity was still on foot; and Yates, pretending himself to be the agent of Mrs. Blagrove in that respect, affected to treat the notice as withdrawn; and in the course of the correspondence, the Plaintiff, either not recollecting what had passed, or perhaps confused between his own recollection and the statement of Yates, in whom he greatly confided, appears to have acquiesced in statements (such as that of an actual tender) which are in-[573]-consistent with the evidence; but upon pretence of the notice being withdrawn, Yates continued to pay or account to the Plaintiff, for the sums which would have become due upon the annuity if subsisting.

On the other side, Mrs. Blagrove and her agent were satisfied that the annuity was redeemed; the redemption money was charged to Mrs. Blagrove by Yates in account; and accounts were afterwards settled between Yates and Mrs. Blagrove, on the footing of the payment for the redemption having actually been made.

The annuity was paid to the Plaintiff till November 1836, and the insurance was kept up, in the Plaintiff's name, till November 1834, but afterwards in the name of Mrs. Blagrave. Yates absconded soon after November 1836; not long after that, he died in insolvent circumstances; and Mr. Anthony Blagrave, having become his legal personal representative, obtained possession of the document in his possession.

After the departure of Yates, the Plaintiff demanded payment of the annuity from Mrs. Blagrave, and this suit is the consequence of her refusal to pay.

It does not appear to me, that after the year 1830 there was, on either side, any laches or neglect, of which the other had any just right to complain. I think that the decision of the case must depend on the relation between the parties and their respective acts and omissions in the year 1830.

It appears to me, from the evidence, that on the 11th of August 1830, when Mrs. Blagrave, by the agency of her son Anthony, gave to Yates a cheque for £11,496, 3s., which he afterwards received, she intended [574] and directed, that a sufficient part of that sum should be applied in redeeming the annuity which she had granted to the Plaintiff. She says, and there is no reason to doubt her statement, that neither she nor her son ever saw the notice for redemption, or any copy of it, and that they were not aware that the annuity could not be redeemed till November. Thinking that the annuity might be redeemed at once, they trusted to Yates to procure the proper releases. As it is stated in the answer, they considered, that Yates was the person through whom the redemption money was to be paid to the Plaintiff, and they expected that he would procure from the Plaintiff such instruments as were necessary to extinguish the annuity, and convey to Mrs. Blagrave the premises on which the same was secured.

Anthony Blagrave says, that he wrote a letter, and requested Yates to give notice to the Plaintiff of Mrs. Blagrave's intention to redeem the annuity. This request was to be complied with by Yates, as the agent of Mrs. Blagrave. The letter containing it cannot be, itself, taken as a notice given to the Plaintiff through Yates as his agent. But Yates, as the agent of Mrs. Blagrave, was to give the notice; and the notice being, as the bill admits, given in May, was for payment in November, and a knowledge of the contents must, notwithstanding the real ignorance which may have existed, be imputed to Mrs. Blagrave. I cannot, under the circumstances of this case, act as if Mrs. Blagrave did not know, and was not to be bound by, what was done by her agent on her behalf according to her instructions.

Again, considering that the sum of £11,496, 3s. was given to Yates on the 11th of August 1830 for the purpose of thereout paying what was due to the Plaintiff, [575] I am of opinion, that the money cannot be considered as so paid to Yates, on behalf of the Plaintiff or as his agent. Yates did not receive the redemption money separately, but as part of an aggregate sum, which he was to divide and apply for the purposes of Mrs. Blagrave. In executing these purposes, it seems plain, that he was to act as her agent; and as to the part of the aggregate sum which was to be applied in redeeming the annuity, he must be deemed to have held it as her agent, for the purpose of that application. It was not payable to the Plaintiff till November. In the meantime, Yates was responsible to her only for its employment; and her direction being to redeem the annuity, it was his duty to her to retain it for her, till he had also, as her agent, obtained for her, releases from the Plaintiff.

Under these circumstances, I conceive, that Yates, when he saw the Plaintiff in Ireland, acted as the agent of Mrs. Blagrave. Whatever mistake may have been made by the Plaintiff in respect to any notice having been given to him, it is plain, that under the notice as admitted in the bill, and on which the Defendant is entitled to rely, there was no obligation, on the part of the Plaintiff, to receive the money in October, or at any time before the 16th of November; and under these circumstances, the Plaintiff having in October executed the deed, which was post-dated the 16th of November, and the warrants of attorney, which were not dated at all, but not having received the money, the nature of the transaction appears to me to shew, that the Plaintiff intrusted Yates as his agent, to hold these deeds till the money was paid to him. It would, I think, be absurd to suppose that the Plaintiff delivered these instruments without consideration to Yates, as the agent of Mrs. Blagrave, and this is scarcely alleged on her behalf; but it is argued, that Yates, having the deeds as the agent [576] of the Plaintiff, on his return to Bristol, delivered them in his character of such agent to Anthony Blagrave, as the agent of Mrs. Blagrave, who relied thereon as evidence of the payment, and that the Plaintiff, although he had received no consideration, was and is bound by such delivery.

If the money had not been previously paid to Yates, but Yates, having the annuity deed and the executed deed of release in his possession, had offered them to Anthony Blagrove in exchange for the money, and if Anthony Blagrove had been thereby induced to give credit to Yates, and had, under such inducement, paid the money to Yates, who had afterwards applied the money to his own use, the transaction might have been binding on the Plaintiff; because his act in giving Yates possession of the deeds, and thereby enabling him to produce them, might have been deemed to be the cause of Anthony Blagrove's misplaced confidence, and of the fraud of Yates which thence ensued, and in the transaction, as so supposed, Yates would have been acting solely as the agent of the Plaintiff, and Anthony Blagrove as the agent of the Defendant.

But in the transaction, as it really occurred, Yates was the agent of Mrs. Blagrove for the payment of the money, both before the deed was executed by the Plaintiff and afterwards. Being her agent (and he was not the less so because he was also agent for the Plaintiff), and whilst he continued to be, and acted as such agent, he was endeavouring to commit, or acquiring the power to commit, a fraud upon the Plaintiff, first, in procuring the deed to be executed at a time when the money was not paid or payable; and, secondly, in producing the deed to Anthony Blagrove, although the money had not been paid. In withholding the money [577] when the deed was executed, and in thus producing the deed, he was also acquiring a power to commit a fraud upon Mrs. Blagrove; and whilst Yates was acquiring this power, and was deceiving both parties, it appears that Mrs. Blagrove was not induced, by the Plaintiff's deed, to intrust Yates with the money, and that the Plaintiff was not induced, by the Defendant's payment to Yates (of which he was ignorant), to intrust Yates with the executed deed.

But the agency for the redemption began with the Defendant. Whilst the money remained in the hands of Yates, he was her agent for its due application, viz., for its payment to the Plaintiff. By giving him the money beforehand, she afforded him the means, perhaps presented to him the temptation, to commit the fraud; and Anthony Blagrove, her agent, being totally unconscious of the fraud which he was enabling Yates to commit, and well knowing that by her the money had been honestly supplied to Yates, in whom she had confidence, for the purpose of payment, may not have examined the proof of payment as carefully as he would have done, if the money had been to be paid on production of the deed.

The complication of the case arises from the double agency of Yates, and from the undue confidence placed in him by the Plaintiff in respect of the deed, as well as by the Defendant in respect of the money; but in the result, the Plaintiff executed the deed without any consideration paid to him. The Defendant's agent had the money on her behalf, with instructions to pay it; he never discharged that duty, never paid the money, as he ought to have done; the duty remained unperformed, and the agency in respect of it continued. It is very clear that in fact the money was not paid. The [578] case of the Defendant is, that she had reason to believe that it was paid, and that the reason being founded on the act of the Plaintiff in executing the deed and leaving it in the hands of Yates, he must be bound by it.

According to the statement of Mr. Anthony Blagrove, he required proof that the consideration was paid; it certainly was his duty to do so: it was to be shewn that the money which, after the 11th of August, was in the hands of Yates as the agent of Mrs. Blagrove, had become the money of the Plaintiff, or a debt due from Yates to the Plaintiff. Under the circumstances of this case, the mere possession of the deed cannot be relied on as affording conclusive evidence; and the proof with which Anthony Blagrove was satisfied, consisted of the information of Yates, and the production of the deed, and of certain warrants of attorney without date or description of the parties named as attorneys.

It appears to me that in a defence founded upon an allegation that the Plaintiff has released or assigned his rights for a pecuniary consideration paid to him, it is incumbent on the Defendant to prove that the consideration was, in fact, paid, and that in this case the proof has failed. It is not shewn that the money ever was in the hands of Yates, as agent for or on behalf of the Plaintiff.

It is to be regretted that the time when Yates returned from Ireland to Bristol, and the day on which his interview with Anthony Blagrove took place, do not distinctly appear. It is sometimes stated that Yates was a fortnight in Ireland; Mrs. Blagrove speaks of the interview, vaguely, as taking place in or soon after November: Anthony Blagrove (who might have been expected to state the day accurately) says that it was in [579] November, immediately after the return of Yates, but he does not specify the day; and I have, in vain, looked through the papers in the hope of finding some clear evidence of the day. Mrs. Blagrove, in her cross-bill, says that, on the 3d day of November, Yates left Ireland and returned to Bristol; but I think that it would not be right to bind her by that statement; and if I had thought it necessary for the decision of this case to ascertain the day accurately, I must have directed an inquiry on the subject. The circumstances, however, are such that I think Anthony Blagrove must have known that the deed was executed by the Plaintiff before the day on which it was dated; and, assuming nothing with respect to the day on which the deed was produced, we have this state of things, that Anthony Blagrove, as the agent of his mother, in the month of August, confided to Yates a certain amount of her money to be applied for her benefit on a future day, viz., on the 16th of the month of November following, that a deed is produced to him, executed by the Plaintiff previously, but dated on the 11th day of November, and acknowledging, in the present tense, the receipt of the money on or before the execution of the deed. The deed, being post-dated, could not be a plain expression of the truth on the day of execution. If the deed was produced to Anthony Blagrove before the 16th of November, it could not express the truth at the time of the production; but, passing that over as not being proved, there was not, as in the absence of payment there could not have been, any money receipt cotemporaneous with the execution of the deed, and no other was required. How it was that Mr. Anthony Blagrove overlooked circumstances so well calculated to excite suspicion, it would be vain to conjecture. Whether, as Mrs. Blagrove says, he was ignorant that the annuity could not be redeemed at any time, or whether he so [580] far trusted to Yates, as to think it immaterial when the deed was executed or when it bore date, and to take no notice of the want of date in the powers of attorney, or of the absence of any receipt except the acknowledgment in the deed, does not appear. It is plain that he must have trusted, in a great measure, to the mere word or statement of Yates, and that he was content with evidence that was not only insufficient, but was of such a nature as to excite very strong suspicion of the truth of the fact which ought to have been established; and, on the whole, I am of opinion, that, after the production and alleged delivery of the deed of release to Anthony Blagrove, the redemption money remained in the hands of Yates, or due from him, as the agent of Mrs. Blagrove and at her risk.

It therefore appears to me that the Plaintiff is entitled to relief; but, proceeding upon his statement of the notice, it is plain that Mrs. Blagrove intended to redeem and was entitled to redeem, the annuity on the 16th day of November 1830, and that the Plaintiff had consented to such redemption. He was entitled to the redemption money on that day; Yates had it as agent of the Defendant, and fraudulently withheld it. The Defendant is, I think, answerable for that—she cannot derive any benefit from the fraud of her own agent; but I do not think that she is answerable for the withdrawal of the notice which Yates affected to make, or that the Plaintiff is entitled to the benefit of such withdrawal.

I think therefore, on the whole, that the Plaintiff is entitled to the £2750 which was due to him in respect of the annuity on the 16th day of November 1830, and that, in accounting for the money received by him from Yates in respect of the pretended continuance of the [581] annuity, he is entitled to interest on the sum of £2750 at 5 per cent. If the parties differ, an account must be taken; and I think that the Plaintiff is entitled to the costs of this suit, and that, paying the costs of Sir Richard Godin Simeon, he is entitled to have them over against the Defendant Mrs. Blagrove.

[581] TARBUCK v. WOODCOCK. Nov. 24, Dec. 13, 1843.

A suit was prosecuted through a solicitor, and as the Plaintiffs alleged, without their authority. The Defendant gave notice of motion to dismiss the bill for want of prosecution, which being served on the solicitor, he requested the Plaintiffs to name a new solicitor, which they refused to do. The solicitor then moved that he might be dismissed as solicitor. Held, that no such order could be made, but personal service on the Plaintiffs of the notice of motion to dismiss was ordered. The Plaintiffs took no step to relieve themselves from their liability. Held, that the Defendant was entitled to have the bill dismissed, with costs to be paid by the Plaintiffs, leaving them to obtain, as against the solicitor, any remedy they might have.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. This suit has been prosecuted in the name of the Plaintiffs, by a solicitor whose name is on the proceedings in the usual course.

Services upon the solicitor whose name is on the proceedings are, by General Order (19th Order, 26th October 1842; Ord. Can. 214), deemed to be good upon the party.

The Plaintiffs have denied that they ever gave the solicitor authority to institute or prosecute the proceedings on their behalf (see 6 Beav. 134); and in this state of things the Defendant, being in a situation to move to dismiss the bill for want of prosecution, serves the notice of his mo-[582]-tion on the solicitor for the Plaintiffs, whose name is on the proceedings, but whose authority is denied.

The solicitor being thus served, requests the Plaintiffs to appoint another solicitor to act for them; and this the Plaintiffs refuse to do, alleging, that as they never authorised the institution of the suit, they have no concern with it, and will not intervene.

On the motion to dismiss coming on to be heard, the solicitor, acting as such for the Plaintiffs, stated the fact, and the motion stood over, to give him the means of considering what steps he should adopt for his own protection.

He now moves that he may be dismissed as the solicitor for the Plaintiffs; and I am of opinion that no such order can be made.

At present it is not known whether the solicitor has acted under the authority of the Plaintiffs or not.

If he has, the Plaintiffs are bound by the service on them, and the Defendant is entitled to an order on his motion.

If he has acted without authority, he is bound to indemnify the Plaintiffs; and he is, or may be, liable to the Defendant for the costs of the suit.

And in this state of things I can do nothing to relieve him from his liability.

The Plaintiffs ought to take the necessary steps to be relieved from their responsibility. If they will not, I [583] must consider the case of the Defendant; and for his better security and protection, I think that I might order that services should be made, not as usual on the solicitor whose name is on the proceedings, but on the Plaintiffs personally, without prejudice to the question by whom any additional costs occasioned by the personal service should be borne.

Dec. 13. Notice having been served on the Plaintiffs personally,

Mr. Pemberton Leigh now moved to dismiss the bill for want of prosecution, with costs.

Mr. Prior submitted that the dismissal should be made without costs as against the Plaintiff Mrs. Hannah Tarbuck, her name having been used without her sanction.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. Having denied the solicitor's authority, notice of this motion was served on her personally: nothing has been done, and the bill must be dismissed on the usual terms. She must obtain from the solicitor any remedy she may be entitled to.(1)

[584] ST. VICTOR v. DEVEREUX. Nov. 13, 1843.

[S. C. reversed on appeal, 9 Jur. 519.]

An application for an order of course should state all the material facts. If there be any suppression, the order will be discharged, and the Court will not, on the application to discharge it, support it on the special merits then, for the first time, appearing.

A Plaintiff claiming partly under the heirs of a French subject, and, through an instrument of doubtful construction, obtained an order of course at the Rolls to sue in formâ pauperis, upon the simple allegation of his poverty: Held, that the order was irregular, on the ground of the suppression of the facts, which ought to have been presented for the consideration of the Court upon the application.

On an application to the Master of the Rolls in a Vice-Chancellor's cause, to discharge an order of course obtained at the Rolls, the Court will not enter into the merits further than is necessary to determine whether the order was regularly obtained.

This was an application to discharge an order to sue in formâ pauperis, which had been obtained ex parte by the Plaintiff.

It appeared that three French ladies, named Francault, De Montmignon and Golleville, were entitled to charges on an estate in France belonging to Fanning, the son, an English subject. The estate had been confiscated by the Revolutionary Government, and the Plaintiff, who claimed under Mesdames de Montmignon and Golleville, and under the heirs of Madame Francault, sought, by this bill, to obtain payment of the charges out of a portion of the compensation fund, provided by the Treaty of Paris for the indemnity of British objects, who, in contravention of the Treaty of Commerce of 1786, had suffered by confiscation of their property (see 59 G. 3, c. 31), and which had been awarded to the Defendant.

The title of the Plaintiff depended on a French instrument, dated the 9th of May 1834, which, as set out in the bill, was to the following effect. (NOTE.—The translation was afterwards found to be inaccurate):—

"We, the undersigned creditors, by mortgage of James R. T. Fanning, the son," &c., "and we, the heirs [585] and heiresses of our deceased sister, aunt and great-aunt, M. F. C. H. L. D. de Francault, also a creditor by mortgage of Mr. James R. T. Fanning, the son, declare altogether to have yielded to Mr. J. B. St. Victor our lawful power of procuration (he intervening and accepting) first, the third of the sum of 63,575 livres tournois, or francs, which we have lent to the said Mr. Fanning by our four contracts of the 19th of October 1791, and 4th of June 1792. Secondly, and moreover all interest which shall be recovered by him in the Court of Chancery in London. This cession is made to him, as well to indemnify him against the expenses he has already made to attain the recovery of the sums due to us by the said Monsieur Fanning, as to recompense him, on account of his long devotedness and his sacrifices for our late sister. We add, that even in case of death of one or several amongst us, we will, that Mr. B. St. Victor shall dispose, as of things belonging to him, of the sums we abandon to him, but subject to the charge of his making, or causing to be made, the advances deemed necessary to obtain the recovery thereof, our formal intention being, that nothing be demanded of us on that account. It is understood that we reserve to ourselves only the two-thirds of the capital of 63,575 francs above mentioned, or the two-thirds of the capital which shall have been reserved in the Court of Chancery in London. The present declaration has for its object to confirm those made previously by us, and which are deposited in the office of Mr. Toullandier, ancient attorney, 18 St. Benoit Street, in Paris, and also to enable Mr. Bourlon St. Victor to procure, in London, upon the sums we abandon to him, upon those due to us by the estate of Mr. Fanning the son, the means which shall be necessary."

The cause was attached to the Court of the Vice-Chancellor of England.

[586] The Plaintiff, upon an ex parte petition addressed to the Master of the Rolls, which stated merely, in the usual form, that he had filed his bill, and was a pauper, obtained from the Under Secretary an order to sue in formâ pauperis.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh and Mr. Beavan now moved to discharge the order. They argued that the instrument was a mere power of attorney, authorising the Plaintiff to sue for other parties, he undertaking to pay the costs. That if it were considered an assignment, it was an assignment, partly from the representatives of Mad. Francault deceased, so that the Plaintiff, whether prosecuting the claim as attorney or assignee, was suing in a representative character, and was not, therefore, entitled to sue in formâ pauperis; Oldfield v. Cobbett (2 Beav. 444, and 3 Beav. 432), Paradice v. Sheppard.⁽¹⁾ Secondly, that even if he was suing in a mixed character, a special, and not an ex parte application ought to have been made; Thompson v. [587] Thompson (1 Turn. & Ven. Ch. Pr. (6th ed.), 513, cited 1 Daniell's Practice, 42). That, at all events, the special circumstances ought to have been stated for the consideration of the Court on the Plaintiff's petition, and that the suppression alone was a sufficient ground to discharge the order.

[Mr. G. Turner, as amicus curiæ, stated a case in the Exchequer, wherein he had been concerned for the Plaintiff, in which the assignee from a clergyman of Easter offerings had instituted a suit for their recovery; having obtained an order to sue in formâ pauperis, the Chief Baron Alexander, on the motion of Mr. Hayter, discharged it.]

Mr. W. Lee, contrâ, argued that the Plaintiff was suing in his own right as assignee of a chose in action and not in a representative character; that the Defendant had been guilty of such delay in making this application that it ought to prevent the discharge of this order.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I can only attend to the question of regularity or irregularity. It is stated that this order was obtained on the common statement and affidavit. In order to obtain it regularly there ought to have been a statement of the special circumstances. If they had been stated, the Plaintiff would not have obtained the order of course, but would have been obliged to make a special application, not here, but to the Vice-Chancellor of England, to whose Court the cause is attached. The question to consider is, whether the order obtained on the common affidavit, and without a statement of the special circumstances, is regular. That depends on the [588] construction of the instrument, which I may look at, in order to see whether there is a question or not, and for the purpose only of deciding whether the order was regularly obtained. (6th Order of 9th May 1839; Ord. Can. 137.) I cannot determine whether, upon the full statement of the circumstances, the Plaintiff is entitled to sue in formâ pauperis. That question does not belong to

(1) 1 Dick. 136, and Beames on Costs, 252 (2d edit.).

Paradice v. Sheppard, 3d December 1745.

An administrator having been admitted at the Rolls to sue in formâ pauperis, the order was discharged by Lord Hardwicke.

The Master of the Rolls had admitted the Plaintiff, who was an administrator, to sue in formâ pauperis. On motion, the Lord Chancellor discharged the order, and dispaupered him—

1st. Because the stat. 11 H. 7, c. 12, which authorises the Court to admit parties to sue in formâ pauperis, is penned much in the same words with the statutes concerning costs, which have been held not to extend to actions by executors or administrators in autre droit.

2dly. On search, no precedent could be found, either in Chancery or in the Courts of Common Law, of admitting an executor or administrator to sue or defend in formâ pauperis.

3dly. The form of the affidavit usually made is not applied to this case, for the party may with truth swear that he is not worth £5 over and above what will pay all his just debts, and yet may have considerable assets of his testator's or intestate's, out of which he may be entitled to retain or be allowed the costs of suit.

Administrator dispaupered.

me, but to the Vice-Chancellor of England. (See Robinson v. Milner, 5 Beav. 49, and Hooper v. Paver, ante, p. 173.) If I should hold this order of course irregular, it will then become necessary for the Plaintiff to get the proper and regular order from the Vice-Chancellor of England.

Mr. Lee. Even if this order be irregular as of course, still the facts, as they now appear, fully warrant the order, and it may therefore be sustained on the merits.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. I cannot agree with you in that. There are few things more important than that parties who apply for orders of course should fairly state all the circumstances which really ought to be considered. It is upon the allegations made upon petitions for orders of course that such orders are made, and if those allegations omit anything material, and which ought to be taken into consideration, the order so obtained is an irregular order.

In this case the order was obtained on the simple and common allegation of the poverty of this Plaintiff, and nothing more; if this had been a case where he was suing in his own right, the order would have been quite regularly obtained; but if he was suing in a character which required the special consideration of [589] the Court, whether, under the circumstances, he was entitled to sue in formâ pauperis or not, then those matters ought to have been adverted to in his application. If that had been done, then, beyond all doubt, the order would have been refused in the Secretary's office, and it would have required a special application to the Court, on which the merits would have been taken into consideration; if he then appeared entitled to sue as a pauper, the proper order would have been made to admit him to sue in formâ pauperis.

Lord Cottenham laid down the rule, that when an application was made to discharge an order of course for irregularity, he would not, under any circumstances, support it as a special order, but would discharge such order of course, giving the party the opportunity of regularly obtaining an order, upon a proper application for the purpose; such has ever since been the practice of this Court. (See Harris v. Start, 4 Myl. & C. 261; Grove v. Sansom, 1 Beav. 297, and Brooks v. Parton, 4 Beav. 494.)

If the real merits of the case, or any questions arising on instruments or on the nature of the Plaintiff's interest, are to be determined, that must be done in the Court to which the cause is attached. Certainly I have no authority, in a cause not attached to this Court, to take those matters into my consideration, further than for the purpose of ascertaining whether such a question arises upon them, as to make it material to have the special matter considered, before granting an order to admit a party to sue in formâ pauperis.

I think that, in this case, the special circumstances ought to have been alluded to upon the application for [590] the pauper order, and not having been mentioned, it appears to me that this order was irregular. To discharge an order for irregularity would discharge it with costs, but it may be material to consider what has happened since the order was obtained.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh. We do not ask for costs.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. The circumstances are such, that I think I must have refused them. I must discharge the order without costs, and it will be quite open to the Plaintiff to apply to the Vice-Chancellor of England on the merits.

[590] PATERSON v. LONG. Nov. 19, 1843.

[S. C. 13 L. J. Ch. 1; 7 Jur. 1049; reported on another point, 5 Beav. 186.]

Two houses, held under one lease, were sold separately to A. and B. The lease was produced and inspected at the sale by the purchasers' solicitors. The conditions of sale provided for the apportionment of the rent between the two purchasers, but did not notice covenants to insure, &c., and a proviso for re-entry on non-performance, contained in the lease. Held, that though A. might be evicted by the default of B., still he was, under the circumstances, bound to complete.

Observations on special conditions of sale.

Two houses were held under one lease from the Marquis of Westminster, at a ground rent of £8. The lease contained covenants to pay the rent, to keep insured, &c., and a proviso for re-entry on non-performance of any of the covenants.

The property having become vested in the Plaintiff, as executor, he put the two leasehold houses up for sale in separate lots. The particulars of sale, after stating [591] the property as "a leasehold estate held under the Marquis of Westminster for a term of years, at a ground rent," and, after describing Lot 1, proceeded, "Held on lease from the Marquis of Westminster, with Lot 2, for a term of ninety-one years from Lady Day 1832, at a ground rent of £8. This lot will be sold subject to the payment of £4 per annum."

The particulars, after describing Lot 2, as similar to Lot 1, proceeded, "Held on lease with Lot 1, as above. This lot will be sold subject to the payment of £4 per annum." The particulars also stated as follows: "The original lease, or abstracts thereof," &c, "will be produced at the time of sale."

The seventh condition provided that the production of the last receipt for rents should be accepted "as evidence of the due performance of all the covenants, clauses, and agreements contained in the original lease."

The eighth condition of sale provided that the purchasers of the two lots (unless one purchaser should purchase both lots), should be parties to each other's assignment, and covenant to pay the proportion of rent allotted to each and to indemnify each other against the same; and also gave mutual powers of distress and entry upon and over the premises purchased by each, as an indemnity against the payment of more than the due proportion of the original rent of £8, payable by each purchaser; and that such last-mentioned purchaser or purchasers should, at his or her own expense, execute a bond, in the penalty of £1000, to the vendor, to indemnify him and the estate of his testator against the rent and covenants in the original lease, as is usual in such cases.

[592] The two lots were sold to different purchasers, and the Defendant Long became the purchaser of Lot 1. He objected to the title, on the ground that the two houses, being held under one lease, he would be liable to eviction by the ground landlord, upon any default being made by the purchaser of the other lot in performing the covenants of the original lease.

The Plaintiff filed his bill for specific performance, alleging that the Defendant had notice, and must be presumed to have had notice, of the stipulations contained in the original lease, and had purchased Lot No. 1 subject thereto.

The Defendant, by his answer, admitted that the lease had been produced at the sale, and had been inspected by his solicitor, but he denied save as aforesaid, that he had, and he submitted whether he was to be considered as thereby having, or must thereby or otherwise be presumed to have had, notice of the stipulations contained in the original lease from the Marquis of Westminster.

By the decree made at the original hearing, it was referred to the Master to inquire, whether a good title could be made to the premises in question in this cause purchased by the Defendant (having regard to the particulars and conditions of sale).

The Master reported that a good title could not be made; and in his written opinion he said, he thought that the Defendant had a right to be indemnified against the consequence that might ensue from a breach of those covenants by the owner of the premises in Lot 2, and that the notice that the premises in Lots 1 and 2 [593] were held under the same lease was not sufficient to release the vendor from giving the indemnity. The Master added, that whether the purchaser had, by reading the original lease and therefore ascertaining to what covenants the original lessee was liable, waived or abandoned his right to be indemnified, was a question for the Court and not for him to decide.

The Plaintiff excepted to this report, and the cause was also brought on for further directions.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh and Mr. Beavan, for the Plaintiff. The Defendant had both constructive and actual notice of the contents of the lease when he became the purchaser. Notice to a purchaser of a lease is notice of its contents; Hall v. Smith. (1)

(1) 14 Ves. 426, and see Taylor v. Stibbert, 2 Ves. jun. 437, 441, and Daniels v. Davison, 16 Ves. 249, and 17 Ves. 433.

This case is precisely similar to Walter v. Maunde (1 Jac. & W. 181), in which it was decided, "that a person contracting to purchase leasehold property is held to contract with notice of the clauses in the lease." The principle has been followed in the subsequent cases. In Cosser v. Collinge (3 Myl. & K. 283) Sir C. C. Pepys says, "Prima facie a man who agrees to take an under-lease must know that he is to be bound by all the covenants contained in the original lease." In that case Mr. Watson, the solicitor of a party who had agreed to take an under-lease, had "cursorily examined" the original lease; and on this the late Master of the Rolls observed, "I am clearly of opinion that Mr. Watson had either actual or constructive notice, because the deeds were brought to him, for the purpose of ascertaining what, if he had used due diligence, he must have [594] discovered. The Plaintiff, therefore, is entitled to the specific performance which he asks; and as I think Mr. Watson might, with due diligence, have discovered what the covenants in the leases were, he is entitled to that specific performance with costs." Again, in Pope v. Garland (4 Y. & Coll. (Exch.) 394) it was held, that upon the sale of leasehold property it is the duty of the purchaser to inquire into the covenants and stipulations of the original lease.

In this case, however, it is unnecessary to refer to the doctrine of constructive notice. Here it is admitted that the lease was produced, and that the Defendant's solicitor inspected it; the Defendant, therefore, had notice of the whole contents, and became aware of the nature of the several covenants and the means reserved by the ground landlord for enforcing them.

If the two purchasers are entitled to an indemnity, it must be an indemnity implied by law, as between themselves, in the same way, as a purchaser of an equity of redemption is under an implied obligation to indemnify the vendor against the payment of the mortgage, (1) or as the purchaser of a leasehold is bound to indemnify the vendor against the payment of rent and performance of covenants. (Staines v. Morris, 1 Ves & B. 8.) This, then, would be matter of conveyance and not of title.

Mr. Turner and Mr. Follett, contra. The Plaintiff has not shewn a good title to this property. The purchaser is entitled to a secure title for the term which he has contracted to purchase; but if he be compelled to accept this title, he will be liable to eviction without any [595] default of his own, in case the purchaser of the other lot should neglect to perform the covenants to insure, &c. These being covenants against fire, &c., against the consequences of a non-performance of which this Court will not relieve (see White v. Warner, 2 Mer. 459), a forfeiture might take place the very day after the purchase, through the default of the purchaser of Lot 2. In Filder v. Hooker (2 Mer. 424, and 3 Mad. 193) the Plaintiff had agreed to grant a lease for twenty-one years; it turned out that the Plaintiff himself held under a lease, and was subject to a proviso for re-entry upon non-performance of the covenants, and therefore could not give to the Defendant a secure lease for the term of his contract; it was decided that he could not compel the Defendant to take the title, even with an indemnity.

In Flight v. Booth (1 Bing. N. C. 370) the particulars stated that no offensive trade was to be carried on upon the premises; but the original lease appeared to prohibit other trades, which were not offensive, and it was held that, on account of the discrepancy between the particulars and the lease, the purchaser was entitled to rescind the contract.

The Plaintiff has acted with such a degree of carelessness as to disqualify himself from enforcing this contract. He was well aware of the objection to the title, and making a provision as to the severance of the rent, he wholly omitted all mention of the proviso for re-entry. The Plaintiff, therefore, was justified in assuming, and did assume, either that there were no other objections to the title than those specially provided for, or that the ground landlord would join and sever the joint liability. The Courts will not assist a party who has, [596] even inadvertently or by negligence, misled a purchaser, and they require that special conditions of sale should be expressed in the most clear and unambiguous terms; Southby v. Hutt (2 Myl. & Cr. 207), Symons v. James (1 Y. & C. (C. C.) 487), Taylor v. Martindale (Id. 658). "If there is misrepresentation, so that the acuteness and industry of the purchaser is set to sleep, and he is induced to believe the contrary of what is the real state of the case, the vendor in such case is bound by that misrepresentation;" Pope v. Garland (4 Y. & C. (Exc.) p. 401).

Mr. Pemberton Leigh, in reply. It is impossible that a purchaser could have believed that the Marquis of Westminster, who was no party to the contract, would have joined in the conveyance; such is not the usual course. The provision for giving to the vendor a bond for the due performance of the covenants, shews that there were other covenants, and that they were to continue. The real intention was to apportion the permanent charge, viz., the rent, between the purchasers, and to leave the contingent liabilities as they were.

Fildes v. Hooker does not apply; that was not a case of a contract to sell a leasehold interest as it existed, but an unrestricted agreement to grant a valid lease for twenty-one years. Here the Plaintiff has not contracted to make out a title for ninety-nine years, but to sell the leasehold interest which he is entitled to, together with another house, under one lease from the Marquis of Westminster.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. Many inconveniences necessarily arise, when leaseholds consisting of several houses held under the same [597] lease are sold in several lots to distinct purchasers; for if the lease, as must be expected, contains covenants affecting the whole, and a proviso that on breach of any covenant, the landlord is to have a right to re-enter, it is evident that the purchaser of one lot may be evicted, without any default of his own part, but solely through the default of another purchaser. This is certainly a very inconvenient state of circumstances, and the question whether a purchaser is to be compelled to complete his purchase depends upon the nature of the contract, what he has agreed to buy, and under what circumstances.

This was an agreement to purchase an existing leasehold interest; and the distinction is important, that it was not an agreement to purchase an absolute interest to endure for a certain number of years, but to purchase "a leasehold estate held under the Marquis of Westminster for a term of years." The leasehold interest was to be sold in two lots, though held under one lease. It is expressly stated in the particulars of sale, that Lot 1 was "held on lease from the Marquis of Westminster with Lot 2," and that Lot 2 was "held on lease with Lot 1 as above," and at the foot of the particulars it was stated, "that the original lease would be produced at the time of the sale."

The lease was produced, and was inspected by the solicitor of the gentleman about to purchase. This is admitted. The whole interest possessed being the whole subject of the sale described, there could not, after the inspection, be the slightest doubt of what was intended. The Defendant purchased the leasehold interest; and he now says that there is in the particulars and conditions, expressions which operate as a misrepresentation. It is not imputed that there is any fraud, [598] but it is said that the purchaser was deluded and lulled by these conditions of sale; that the leaseholds were held under one rent, and were subject to covenants of a special nature, as covenants to insure, not to permit noisome trades to be carried on upon the premises, &c., and on breach of any of which covenants, a right of re-entry was reserved to the lessor, yet it was merely stated that Lot 1 was to be sold subject to a ground rent of £4.

The whole being held under a rent of £8, it was necessary to make an arrangement for the apportionment, and it was provided for by the conditions. Again, it was necessary to shew that there was then a good title, which would not have been the case if there had been a breach of covenant, and a right of re-entry had accrued to the landlord, and provision was made for that, for the seventh condition provides that the production of the receipts should be evidence of the performance of all the covenants. This therefore is guarded against.

The eighth contains this, "that the purchaser shall execute a bond in the penalty of £1000 to the vendor, to indemnify him and the estate of his testator against the rent and covenants in the original lease, as is usual in such cases." Surely, if, on the sale of the leasehold interest, the lease was produced, and the purchasers were told that they must indemnify each other as against the apportioned rent, and the landlord as against "rent and covenants," it cannot be said either that the party was not aware of what he was doing, or that it was intended that the landlord was to release the covenants. This condition implies unavoidably that the covenants were to be continued in force.

In this state of things the purchaser says, I ought to be indemnified, because I had a right to assume that [599] the landlord would join in releasing or in apportioning the covenants. I do not think there is any ground for that assumption; there may be great inconvenience, but the purchaser contracted subject to it. I may also observe that the purchaser of Lot 2 has as great an interest in preventing a forfeiture as the purchaser of Lot 1.

The exception must be allowed, and there must be a decree for specific performance with costs.

I quite agree with the observations which have been made on special conditions of sale; and I think that equity, nay, common honesty, requires, that conditions of sale should fairly represent the real situation of the property. (See Hyde v. Dallas, 4 Beav. p. 608, and the cases there cited.)

[600] WEDGWOOD v. ADAMS. Nov. 23, 24, 1843.

In cases of specific performance, Courts of Equity exercise a discretion. In cases of great hardship, they will not interfere, but will leave the Plaintiff to his remedy by recovery of damages at law.

Trustees joined their cestui que trust in a contract for sale, and personally agreed to exonerate the estate from any incumbrances thereon. There were considerable incumbrances, and it did not appear whether the purchase-money would be sufficient to discharge them, or what would be the extent of the deficiency. The Court refused to decree a specific performance against the trustees, so as to compel them to exonerate the estate, but left the purchaser to his remedy by action for damages.

This was a bill filed by a purchaser for the specific performance of a contract.

In February 1838 Ann Parry and William Edwards Parry, being entitled to some real estate, which was then subject to certain incumbrances, conveyed it to three trustees, Adams, Leach and Paynter, on trust to sell, and apply the produce in payment of the mortgages and incumbrances thereon, and then in payment of the scheduled debts of the grantors, due on judgment, bond, and otherwise, and afterwards of the costs, charges, and expenses of the trustees, and then to pay off all sums of money raised and advanced under the powers contained in the settlement made on the marriage of William Edwards Parry and Martha his wife; and also in payment to the said Ann Parry of such sum as would be sufficient to purchase an annuity or clear yearly sum of £100 for the life of the said Ann Parry, and then upon trust, to pay the residue or surplus of the monies to arise from the intended sale or sales unto Ann Parry and William Edwards Parry, in such proportions as Adams, Leach and Paynter should appoint and determine.

In May 1838 the three trustees and Ann Parry and William Edwards Parry entered into a contract in writing, for the sale to the Plaintiff, Colonel Wedgwood, of part of the property. The agreement was expressed to be [601] made between Adams, Leach and Paynter (as trustees for Ann Parry and William Edwards Parry), and Ann Parry and William Edwards Parry on the one part, and the Plaintiff of the other part, and thereby, the former agreed to sell to the latter the property in question for £5600; and the parties of the first part agreed, on receipt of the purchase-money, that they, and all other persons having any estate or interest therein, would convey the property to the Plaintiff. The agreement then proceeded as follows:—"And it is hereby agreed, that if any part of the said premises be subject to an incumbrance, the same shall, if required by the said T. J. Wedgwood, be exonerated by the said J. Adams, Francis G. Leach, W. E. Paynter, Ann Parry, and William E. Parry, and the estate vested in them, previously to the surrender or other conveyance to the said T. J. Wedgwood."

The property was, at the time, subject to certain incumbrances, the amount of which had not, at the original hearing, been ascertained. All the Defendants appeared and answered the bill; but the two Parrys and Paynter having made default in appearing at the hearing, the Plaintiff took a decree against them by default, and it was referred to the Master to ascertain the value of the property comprised in the indenture of February 1838, and the incumbrances thereon.

By the Master's report, it appeared that the monies receivable from the whole of the property, if sold, would be less than the amount of the existing incumbrances thereon, and the amount of the deficiency was a subject of dispute between the parties. Adams and Leach had not had notice of some of the incumbrances till after the institution of the suit.

[602] The cause having come on for further directions,

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Parry, for the Plaintiff, asked for a decree against the trustees for the specific performance of the contract entered into by them, and a direction for them to exonerate the estate according to the express terms of the contract.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh, Mr. Turner, and Mr. Edgar Montagu, for the Defendants, the trustees. In cases of specific performances, the Courts of Equity exercise a discretion, and will not interfere if the circumstances of the case make it unreasonable so to do. They will not execute a contract which unfairly presses on one of the parties. Thus a mortgagor who contracts to grant a lease, will not be decreed to pay off the mortgage, in order to enable him to complete the contract; Costigan v. Hastler (2 Sch. & Lef. 160), the lessee will be left to his remedy at law. So where a tenant for life, who, upon the settlement by him of lands of equal value, was absolutely entitled to the settled estates, entered into a contract for the sale of them, the Court declined ordering him to procure and settle lands of equal value, in order to complete his contract, Howell v. George (1 Mad. 1); and in Malins v. Freeman (2 Keen, 25), the Court declined to interfere, where, by mistake, a party had, at an auction, bid for and purchased the wrong lot. Here the trustees, having no personal interest, have, improvidently and without knowing the state of the incumbrances, contracted to exonerate the estate from them: there is no knowing the extent of their liability if they are compelled specifically to perform the contract. This is a proper case for damages at law.

[603] Mr. Kindersley, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The question is simply this, whether the trustees, who entered into this contract, are personally liable to exonerate the purchased estate from the incumbrances which affect it, and whether they are to be compelled specifically to perform the contract which they have entered into.

The first question argued is as to the meaning of the contract. It appears that Ann Parry and W. E. Parry, the owners of the estate in question, were indebted apparently to a large amount, and they conveyed the estate to three trustees, in order that it might be sold. The contract was entered into by the three trustees and by the two persons beneficially interested in the estate. The duties to be performed by the trustees and the beneficial owners were, as in all ordinary cases, very distinct. The trustees were to perform the duties belonging to their trust, and the beneficial owners were to perform every duty attached to the property. This being the situation of the parties, it is, in the commencement of the contract, carefully stated that the three trustees were trustees of the estates of the other parties to the contract, and it is also expressly stated that they entered into the contract as trustees. In the course, however, of the same contract, the trustees and the beneficial owners are joined together in the same agreement, that is, they all agree, without any distinction, that there shall be a clear title made out at their expense, that the estate shall be conveyed or surrendered free from incumbrance, and that there shall be covenants for quiet enjoyment, and so on; and then follows another and distinct agreement, that if there shall be [604] any incumbrance on the property, it shall be exonerated by the five persons named, viz., by the trustees and the beneficial owners, and that the estate shall be vested in them prior to the conveyance.

On the construction of the contract, I am inclined to think that its effect is to create a personal obligation in the trustees, but I can hardly believe that this effect could have been known to the parties at the time. It is to me extraordinary, that trustees who had no interest whatever in the matter, should knowingly enter into a personal obligation to exonerate the trust estate from every incumbrance that might affect it. It seems to me equally extraordinary, that a purchaser who intended to rely on the personal liability of the trustees should not have taken care to have that distinctly stated, and to distinguish the trustees from the persons beneficially interested, and not confound them in the same agreement, as seems to have been done here.

I conceive this to be an ill-drawn contract: the effect may however be that contended for by the Plaintiff. Suppose it to be so, the question then arises, whether, under the circumstances, it is a fit contract to be specifically performed. One of the questions raised is, that the obligation is not formally enough insisted upon in the pleadings; but I think that a Plaintiff is not obliged to state each particular portion of the contract which he calls upon the party to perform, and that when he asks for a specific performance, a specific performance of every thing in the contract is implied.

That being so, the question is, whether the contract is of such a nature, as, under the circumstances, the Court will decree a specific performance? Now I would rather, before I decide that question, look at the [606] cases which have been cited on the subject; but with reference to the last argument used, viz., the difficulty of determining what sum would be unreasonable to compel the trustees to pay, and at what amount the Court would stop; I conceive the doctrine of the Court to be this, that the Court exercises a discretion, in cases of specific performance, and directs a specific performance unless it should be what is called highly unreasonable to do so. What is more or less reasonable, is not a thing that you can define, it must depend on the circumstances of each particular case. The Court, therefore, must always have regard to the circumstances of each case, and see whether it is reasonable that it should, by its extraordinary jurisdiction, interfere and order a specific performance, knowing at the time that if it abstains from so doing, a measure of damages may be found and awarded in another Court. Though you cannot define what may be considered unreasonable, by way of general rule, you may very well, in a particular case, come to a balance of inconvenience, and determine the propriety of leaving the Plaintiff to his legal remedy by recovery of damages.

There would be great inconvenience either way in this case. By this contract, Colonel Wedgwood was to have possession of the estate five years ago. He has had possession, and certainly cannot now be deprived of the benefit of this contract without very great inconvenience. On the other hand, if these Defendants are called on to perform the contract in the way here asked, what means have I of measuring the inconvenience to which they will be subject? I have statements on both sides as to the accounts and charges, but I can form no opinion whatever as to what may be the result from the Master's report, on which, I find it in great controversy between the parties, whether the whole purchase-money of the estate will or will not discharge the incumbrances. I must, therefore, look at it in this light, that it may not be sufficient; and if so, I have no measure of the extent to which the purchase-money may be deficient. It may be £200, £300, or £500, and for anything I know, it may be £5000.

I will not decide the question at this moment, as I wish to look at the cases: I will mention it again.

Nov. 24. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. In this case, I have looked over the papers, and I think that the contract is not at all less extraordinary than the trust deed, which is a deed for the payment of every sort of claim before even the costs and expenses of the deed.

However, after consideration, I think I cannot order a specific performance of that agreement; and with regard to its being a mere money objection, I could not, when this case was argued, call distinctly to my mind a case of that sort, of which

I had some recollection, and which came before Lord Hardwicke. It is a case not actually reported, but it is cited in the argument. (In Ramsden v. Hylton, 2 Ves. sen. p. 307.) There, a person being entitled to a small estate under the will of his father, on condition that if he sold it within twenty-five years, half the purchase-money should go to his brother, sold it within the time, and the question was whether that agreement should be specifically performed; Lord Hardwicke thought not, because, by the specific performance of it he would lose half the purchase-[607]-money. I think that came very nearly to a case of mere pecuniary objection.

I cannot decree a specific performance, and it is for the Plaintiff therefore to consider what he will do.

NOTE.—The bill was afterwards dismissed without costs, November 1844. See post.

[607] JACKLIN v. WILKINS. Dec. 18, 1843.

A Plaintiff cannot, before appearance, serve a notice of motion on the Defendant, without first obtaining the special leave of the Court; and the notice of motion should state that such leave has been given.

After the Defendant had been served with a subpoena, but before he had appeared and before the time for appearance had expired, the Plaintiff, without any special leave of the Court, gave the Defendant notice of motion for an injunction.

The Defendant did not appear upon the motion.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS having intimated that he thought the proceeding irregular.

Mr. Schomberg, in support of the motion, argued as follows:—Formerly it was necessary to serve the Six Clerk with all notices of motion; until appearance the Defendant had not appointed one, and it was therefore of necessity that the Court should be applied to for the purpose of allowing the notice to be served personally; but the office of Six Clerk has been abolished, and now by the [608] New Orders of October 1842 (Ord. Can. 214, 215), the parties themselves and their attorneys may be served with notice of all applications; it is therefore no longer necessary to obtain special leave to serve them.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS said there had been no alteration in the practice in this respect. That special leave ought to have been obtained, and that the fact should have been stated in the notice of motion. (Hill v. Rimell, 8 Sim. 632.)

Mr. Schomberg then proposed to move ex parte; but

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] said that, after the delay which had taken place, such a course could not be permitted. (NOTE.—See Ramsbottom v. Freeman, 4 Beavan, 145.)

Reports of CASES in CHANCERY ARGUED and DETERMINED in the ROLLS COURT during the time of LORD LANGDALE, Master of the Rolls. 1843, 1844. By CHARLES BEAVAN, Esqr., M.A., Barrister-at-Law. Vol. VII. 1846.

[1] THE MARQUIS OF HERTFORD v. LORD LOWTHER. (COUNTESS ZICHY'S CASE)
June 12, Dec. 14, 1843.

[See In re Prater, 1887, 36 Ch. D. 476, the effect of which case on the older authorities is stated in In re Robson [1891], 2 Ch. 559. A note in the Addenda states that this case was affirmed by the Lord Chancellor on Dec. 20, 1845.]

Generally, choses in action do not pass by a bequest of "goods and chattels," in a particular locality.

Bequest of "all the goods and chattels, plate, linen, money at the bankers, or stock in the Monte de Milano, linen, horses, carriages, &c., I may die possessed of at M." Held, not to pass Polish certificates and Neapolitan bordereaux (being Government obligations), there situate, entitling the bearers to receive the interest and capital at a future time. Held, also, that such securities could not be considered as money or cash; and, 3dly, that not having their locality at M., they did not pass under the words et cetera at M.

By a codicil to his will, dated the 3d of May 1827, the late Marquis of Hertford bequeathed as follows:—

"I give and bequeath to Charlotte Leopoldina, now Countess Emanuel de Zichy, over all other bequests and legacies, all the goods and chattels, plate, linen, money at the bankers or stock in the Monte de Milano, linen, horses, carriages, &c., I may die possessed of at Milan, or in Lombardy, on condition she gives £3000 sterling to the Cassa d'Assicurazione, to make an annuity for the life of Angelica Felicite Borel (late of Milan, No. 1246 Contrada di Monte, and of No. 3 Rue Provence at Paris), [2] and that her husband gives her power to hold this as her own separate property. A codicil."

"HERTFORD."

The testator, at the time of his death, was the owner of property at Milan of various descriptions and of considerable value, the particulars of which the Master set forth in a schedule to his report, and amongst them he included the following particulars:—

600 Polish certificates A, of 300 florins each, with 5 per cent. interest, payable 1st January and 1st July; in total, 180,000 florins.

1259 Polish certificates B, of 200 florins each, without interest; in total, 251,800 florins.

Four certificates of the Vienna Loan, to be reimbursed 1st January 1843, of 370 florins each; in total 1480 florins.

Seventeen certificates of the Vienna Loan, 1831, of 500 florins each, nominal capital, without interest; in total, 8500 florins.

Eight bordereaux, each bearing 10 coupons of six months' interest of 12 ducats and 50 grains, relative to the Neapolitan State obligations.

The Master found that, together with other property of various kinds, these certificates and bordereaux passed to the Countess Zichy, by the codicil of the 3d day of May 1827.

The Plaintiff took exceptions to this report, which now came on for argument.

[3] The precise nature of the certificates and bordereaux did not appear upon the report; but the Master had treated them as negotiable securities which passed by delivery. Previous to judgment being delivered, authenticated translations were obtained, from which the Court considered that they "constituted the bearers the persons entitled to receive, at future times, the interest and capital to which the instruments respectively were the evidence of title."

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Schomberg, in support of the exceptions. The certificates and bordereaux do not pass by the codicil. There are two rules of construction which determine this question. First, where there is a gift of certain enumerated descriptions of personal property, followed by general words, as "all other goods and chattels," the operation of the latter words is limited to things ejusdem generis, as those enumerated, and they will not be extended to the general personal estate. Thus, in Trafford v. Berrige (1 Eq. Ca. Ab. 201), money was held not to pass by the words "all goods, chattels, household stuff, furniture, and other things" in the testator's house; the reason given is this:—"For by the words other things, shall be intended things of the like nature and species with those before mentioned." The general rule was admitted in Hotham v. Sutton (15 Ves. 326). So in Timewell v. Perkins (2 Atk. 103) it was held that a devise of plate, jewels, linen, household goods, and coach and horses, will be confined to things of the same nature; and that goldsmiths' notes and bank bills do not pass by those words. (See Sutton v. Sharp, 1 Russ. 146.)

These certificates, therefore, not being in the nature of "goods, chattels," &c., will not pass under this bequest. [4] Secondly, where there is a gift of personal property in a given locality, choses in action, which have no locality, will not pass, although the securities may be there-situate: the only exception is that of Bank of England notes, which are considered money. In Chapman v. Hart (1 Ves. sen. 271. And see Belt's Supplement, 146) there was a gift of all the testator's "goods and chattels in his house and on board the 'Warwick'" (a man-of-war). Lord Hardwicke said, "Undoubtedly no goods and chattels in the house can pass but such as were properly in possession, not choses in action, except bank notes, which the Court considers as cash; for these words may certainly extend farther than to bare furniture: and if any ready money in the house (if not an extraordinary sum, and just received) that would pass. In the Countess of Aylesbury's case (Amb. 68), I was of opinion, that by devise of all things in a house, money and bank notes passed to the testator's wife, and that the testator meant to consider the notes as cash: but bonds do not pass, not admitting of a locality, except as to the probate of wills," &c.

In Green v. Symonds (1 Bro. C. C. 129, n.) B. bequeathed to C. all his goods, &c., in his study, except his books and writings. He gave to D. all his books at his chambers in the Temple. At the testator's death, there were in his study a considerable sum of ready money, securities for money and plate; but he had removed the books into the country. One of the questions was, whether C. should take the money, securities, &c., which were in the study, or the furniture only. And the Lord Chancellor held, the money and plate to pass, but not the securities for money, as they were choses in action.

[5] In Moore v. Moore (1 B. C. C. 127) Lord Thurlow held that, under a bequest of "all in Suffolk to R. M.," a bond, which happened to be at the testator's house in Suffolk, did not pass. And in Brooke v. Turner (7 Simons, 671), under a bequest, of "all the property over which the testatrix had a disposing power in and about her dwelling-house," was held to pass Bank of England notes, but not country bank notes, or promissory notes. A bequest of "all my property, of whatever nature, &c., in Duke Street, except a bond of F. M.," was held not to pass a bond from G. C.; Fleming v. Brook (1 Sch. & Lef. 318. And see Collier v. Squire 3 Russ. 467).

Mr. G. Turner and Mr. Tripp, contra. This is purely a question of intention. The words "goods, chattels, &c.," are quite sufficient to carry the property in question, and there is no intention by the specific description of particular property to limit the operation of these general words. The particular enumeration of property was introduced, not for the purpose of diminishing the extent of gift, but from an anxiety that the legatee should take all property whatever at Milan; the words et cetera extend the gift to every species of property at that place.

The bequest is not confined to things ejusdem generis. In Kendall v. Kendall (4 Russ. 360) it was held, that a bequest of "all monies, goods, chattels, clothing &c., the testator's property which might remain after paying his funeral charges and debts," will pass the testator's interest in stock and money. And in Arnold v. Arnold (2 Myl. & K. 365) a bequest of "my wines and property in England" was held to pass the testator's property in England of every [6] description, including money in the funds and at his bankers, debts, and arrears of pension, and that it was not confined to property ejusdem generis with wines; and in Parker v. Marchant (1 Y. & C. (C. C.), 290, and 1 Phillips, 356) a balance at the bankers was held to pass under the words "ready money." Supposing, however, the operation of the general words to be limited to property ejusdem generis, then these certificates are of the same nature as the "money at the bankers, and stock in the Monte de Milano."

Secondly, the certificates, which of themselves give a title to the holder, have a locality; the legatee is entitled to those certificates, and having rightful possession of those documents, she will become entitled to the money payable on them. Here the legatee has a condition imposed on her of paying £3000, and it does not appear whether the other property given by this codicil will be sufficient for that purpose; this therefore is a strong reason for extending the operation of the words of gift, if that be necessary. (See the cases, 2 Jarman on Wills, 171.)

Mr. Kindersley, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS reserved his judgment.

Dec. 14. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. After the arguments were concluded, I was requested to suspend my judgment until the parties had obtained authenticated translations of the instruments in question.

Such translations have since been supplied to me; the documents appear to me to be evidences of ob-[7]ligations entered into by the Governments established in Poland, Austria, and Naples respectively; and they appear to be so expressed as to constitute the bearers the persons entitled to receive, at future times, the interests and the capitals of the title to which the instruments respectively are the evidence. The Master has treated them as negotiable securities which pass by delivery.

The question is, whether they pass by the words of the bequest.

The Master has considered that they are comprehended within the true meaning of the words "goods and chattels," and that the extensive meaning of these words is not reduced by the effect of the words, "I may die possessed of at Milan or in Lombardy," which follow after the enumeration of many particulars which he has distinctly named.

From the words which are used, it appears to me so probable that the testator intended to give this lady all which he had at Milan, that, independently of authority, I should have concurred in the Master's opinion.

But in Green v. Symonds (1 Bro. C. C. 129, n.) Lord King held that a gift of all the testator's goods and moveables whatsoever in his study, except books and writing, did pass money and plate found there, but did not pass securities for money, they being choses in action.

In Lady Aylesbury's case (Ambler, 68, 11 Ves. 662) Lord Hardwicke held, that a gift of the testator's house and all that should be in it at his death, though it passed cash and bank notes, did not pass promissory notes and securities, as they were evidence of title to things out of the house, and not to things in it.

[8] In Chapman v. Hart (1 Ves. sen. 271) the same Judge declared, that no securities for money, nor other choses in action, passed by a bequest of all goods and chattels in the testator's house, or on board the ship "Warwick." Bank notes might pass, because the Court considered them as cash.

In Moore v. Moore (1 Bro. C. C. 127) Lord Thurlow (as Lord Redesdale says on a view of all preceding cases on the subject) decided, that a legacy of "all the testator's goods and chattels in Suffolk" did not pass a bond which was in the testator's house there.

In the case of Fleming v. Brook (1 Sch. & Lefroy, 318) Lord Redesdale held, that bonds and bankers' receipts did not pass by a gift of "all the testator's property, of whatever nature or kind the same might be" in a particular house.

And in Brooke v. Turner (7 Sim. 671) the Vice-Chancellor of England held, that country bank notes, promissory notes, and accountable memoranda did not pass under the description of "property of every sort and kind, over which the testatrix had a disposing power, in or about a dwelling-house."

It does not appear to me that the effect of these authorities is altered by the cases of Kendall v. Kendall (4 Russ. 360), and Arnold v. Arnold (2 Myl. & K. 365), which were cited. In Kendall v. Kendall the gift was not confined to property in any particular place; and in Arnold v. Arnold the gift was of all wines and property in England, and the particulars claimed by the legatees were found to be the testator's property in England at the time of his decease.

[9] In the cases to which I have referred, the securities were held not to be property in the places where the securities were, but choses in action and evidences of property existing elsewhere; and the distinction attempted to be made in this case, between securities which pass by delivery and those which require something more than delivery, has not been observed. Lord Eldon (11 Ves. 662) said, that he did not know why, in these cases, bank notes were considered as cash, for he thought them just in the same situation as promissory notes and securities, which were the evidences of title to things out of the place. Perhaps the reason might be found in the common habit of men to speak of bank notes as cash, and the manifest defeat of their testamentary intentions, which would be the effect of the Court not so considering them; but be this as it may, I consider myself bound by authority, and that choses in action do not pass under the words "goods and chattels" in a particular locality.

I do not think that the securities can be considered as money or cash, and the words "et cetera" which were relied on in argument can only be extended to things which the testator was possessed of at Milan, or in Lombardy; and the authorities determine that, in such cases, choses in action (except bank notes) are not considered as having the locality of the places where the securities are. Being of opinion that, in that sense, the certificates and bordereaux are choses in action—evidences of title to property elsewhere—I think that they did not pass by the codicil, and that the exception to the Master's report must be allowed.

NOTE.—The parties appealed to the Lord Chancellor.

A Plaintiff examined a Defendant as a witness in the cause. Held, that such Defendant was, on that account, entitled to his costs of suit.

A. B., an equitable mortgagee, lent the title-deeds to C. D., the mortgagor, to enable him to arrange a sale of the property. C. D. was indebted to A. B., both on the mortgage and on a trade account. C. D. paid to A. B. a part of the produce of the sale; but there was no evidence of his having made any express appropriation of that payment. Held, that it must be understood that the payment was made on the mortgage account, and that A. B. had no right to appropriate it to the trade account.

A mortgagor, who had borrowed the title-deeds from an equitable mortgagee, to enable him to sell the property, handed them to his solicitor, in order to complete. The mortgagee acquiesced in the sale. Held, that the solicitor had a lien on the deeds for his costs of the transaction only, but not for his other claims for costs against the mortgagor.

In the year 1835 the Defendant English, who was entitled to a leasehold house and premises in St. James's Street, borrowed £800 from the Plaintiff Young, on the security of certain promissory notes, a warrant of attorney to confess judgment, and an agreement that English would, at a future time, deliver up to him the lease and other deeds belonging to the premises. Pursuant to the agreement, the lease and deeds were actually delivered to the Plaintiff in the year 1837, and £200, part of the debt, being afterwards paid, the Plaintiff remained equitable mortgagee of the premises for the sum of £600 and interest.

The Defendant English carried on the business of an hotelkeeper upon the premises, and the Plaintiff, being a wine and spirit merchant, supplied English with goods, in respect of which, a debt became due to him in addition to the mortgage. In 1840 the Plaintiff having the lease and other deeds as equitable mortgagee for £600 and interest, and being also a creditor of English for goods sold and delivered, the trustees for the Conservative Club, who were Defendants, by their solicitors, applied to English to dispose of his interest in the lease, and give up his business as an hotelkeeper, in order that the house might be converted into a club house; [11] and after some treaty, English agreed to this, in consideration of the sum of £1150 to be paid him.

Upon the terms being agreed to, English desired the Defendant Mr. Henry Walker, whom he employed on other occasions as his solicitor, to act for him in completing the sale. Mr. Walker stated that he should want the lease and title-deeds; English undertook to procure them, and he accordingly applied to Mr. Farrell, an agent of the Plaintiff, in whose possession the deeds were, for a loan of them for two or three days; and the Plaintiff having consented to lend them on terms, they were, on the 3d day of November 1840, placed in the hands of English, upon his signing and delivering to Farrell a memorandum dated on the same day, and in these words:—"I hereby acknowledge to have received from you the different deeds hereafter specified, relating to my house the St. James's Royal Hotel, 88 St. James's Street, which I undertake to return safe, on or before Friday next, the 6th of the present November." At the foot of the memorandum was a list of the deeds, and to the list was subjoined this note:—"The whole of the above documents being in deposit with Mr. Young (the Plaintiff), as securities for monies advanced to me (English), and yet remaining unpaid."

English having thus obtained the deeds, carried them to Walker, and gave him instructions to do what was necessary for carrying the sale into effect.

Mr. Walker, by his answer, which had not been replied to, said positively, that at the time when the deeds were so delivered to him, English did not inform him, nor did he know, or in any way suspect, that the Plaintiff, or any other person, had any equitable or other mortgage on [12] the premises, or any lien or claim on the deeds relating thereto.

Mr. Walker prepared the abstract of title from the deeds, communicated with the solicitors of the purchasers, and on the 16th day of November 1840 the agreement in writing for the sale was settled and approved.

In the meantime, English had not performed his undertaking to return the deeds to the Plaintiff; and having stated (when he was applied to on the subject) that he had delivered them to Walker, the Plaintiff became alarmed, and on the 13th of November Messrs. Wood & Ellis, his solicitors, wrote to Walker as follows:—"We find that Mr. Young has allowed Mr. English of the St. James's Hotel, to have the deeds of that house, for the purpose of enabling you, as his solicitor, to prepare and settle an agreement for the disposition of the residue of the term therein. Under these circumstances, it is right that Mr. Young should have your acknowledgment that you hold them for him, subject to immediate return to him on demand, in order that no doubt or difficulty may hereafter arise, by reason of the special accommodation so offered to Mr. English. We shall be obliged, therefore, by the receipt of such acknowledgment and undertaking in due form, at your earliest convenience."

Mr. Walker did not, upon the receipt of the letter, appear to have made immediate enquiries into the foundation of the Plaintiff's claim. If he had done so, he would then, at least, have known that the Plaintiff was clearly entitled as equitable mortgagee, and that the purchase-money ought to be applied in satisfaction of his debt.

[13] Instead of making any such enquiry, Mr. Walker returned a very unsatisfactory answer to the letter of Wood & Ellis. English misrepresented the real facts of the case, and apparently misled Mr. Walker as well as the Plaintiff, by telling the former that he had satisfied the latter. Mr. Walker, notwithstanding the letter of the 13th of November, and another letter, dated the 16th of November, which he received from Wood & Ellis, proceeded to the completion of the agreement with the trustees of the Conservative Club, without paying any regard to the claim of the Plaintiff. The agreement was engrossed; it was executed by English; the sum of £300 was paid to English in part of the purchase-money, and the purchasers were let into possession on the 18th day of November. By the agreement, the sum of £300, further part of the purchase-money, was to be paid on the 20th of January 1841, and the remainder being £550, on the 29th of September 1841, and Mr. Walker signed an undertaking to deliver up the title-deeds on the execution of the assignment. English, notwithstanding his having misrepresented some of the facts, called on the Plaintiff and paid him the £300 which he had received as the first instalment of the purchase-money; but on the 23d of January 1841 English received the second instalment of £300 and then absconded.

This bill was filed on the 2d of March 1841, and prayed that the Plaintiff might be declared to have a lien upon the unpaid purchase-money, for the amount of what is due to him; and that he might be declared to have been entitled to apply £300 (part of the purchase-money which had been paid to him) towards the discharge of a book debt; that accounts might be taken of the purchase-money unpaid, and of what remained due to him; that the purchasers might be declared not to be entitled to a sum of £67, 2s. 5d., which they claimed in [14] respect of rent; and that as against the Plaintiff's claim, the Defendant, Mr. Walker had not any lien on the lease and title-deeds, for his general bill of costs against Mr. English. Walker, as before stated, by his answer, denied all notice of the Plaintiff's claim, and he thereby claimed such a lien as the Court should consider him entitled to. A replication was filed to his answer, which was afterwards withdrawn, and he was examined as a witness on behalf of the Plaintiff.

In January 1842 English became bankrupt, and his assignees were brought before the Court by supplemental bill.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh and Mr. Bagshawe, for the Plaintiff. The Defendant, Walker, who claims merely an equity, is entitled to such interest only as English himself had; English had expressly undertaken to return the deeds, which in equity both he and his solicitor are bound to perform. Walker therefore has no lien whatever.

As no appropriation was made by English of the £300 paid by him, the Plaintiff has a right to attribute it to the trade account, thus leaving the equitable mortgage undischarged. (See Devaynes v. Noble (Clayton's case), 1 Mer. 605, 606.)

Mr. Goodeve, for Walker. There being no replication to this Defendant's answer, it must be taken to be true in all its parts, and the Plaintiff having examined him as a witness, can have no decree against him, and must pay his costs of suit. (2 Daniel's Practice, 451; Carter v. Hawley, cited in Ambler, 583.)

[15] In Bernard v. Drought (1 Molloy, 38; but see Smith v. Chichester, 2 Dr. & War. 393), it was held that an incumbrancer negligently leaving title-deeds in the grantor's possession, a lien may be obtained on them by the grantor delivering them to a solicitor. Here Walker has obtained a lien, not only for the costs of completing this purchase, but for his other general business transacted for English.

Mr. G. Turner, for the trustees of the Conservative Club, claimed to be entitled to deduct from the purchase-money £67, 2s. 5d., being such portion of the ground rent due at Lady Day 1841, as accrued due before possession was given up.

Mr. Kindersley, for the assignees, claimed to be entitled to the unpaid purchase-money, on the ground that the deeds were in the order and disposition of the bankrupt; secondly, that the Plaintiff had no right to make the appropriation of the £300 which he contended for, as that sum formed part of the produce of the mortgaged premises, and must be taken to have been paid in part discharge of the mortgage thereon; thirdly, that a great portion of the purchase-money was the consideration for the goodwill of the business, on which neither the Plaintiff nor Walker could have any claim.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh, in reply. It is not true that you cannot have a decree against a Defendant whom you examine as a witness. The rule is, that you cannot have a decree as to those matters alone as to which you have examined him. Nightingale v. Dodd (Ambler, 583), Murray v. Shadwell (2 Ves. & B. 401), Ellis v. Doane (3 Molloy, 53); besides this, [16] the Defendant himself requires a declaration of right in order to obtain the benefit of his alleged lien. Hutton v. Sands (Younge, 602).

If Walker has a lien, it is limited only to the costs of the purchase. Blundell v. Desart (2 Dr. & War. 405).

Dec. 22. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. Four questions are made.

First. The assignees claim to be entitled to the remaining purchase-money, on the ground that the deeds were in the order and disposition of the bankrupt. For this claim there is no foundation.

Secondly. The Plaintiff, being creditor in respect of his mortgage debt, and also in respect of a book debt, claims to be entitled to the sum of £300, which he received on the 19th of November 1840, in satisfaction of the book debt. In support of his claim, in that respect, he alleges, that nothing was said as to the application of the money which he received, and he insists, that in the absence of express direction, he has a right to make the application most beneficial to himself. But it appears to me, from the nature of the transaction, that English paid this money only in respect of the Plaintiff's right to the mortgage, and that it must, from the circumstances, be understood, that English meant the payment to be applied towards satisfaction of the mortgage.

Thirdly. The purchasers claim to be entitled to deduct from the purchase-money the sum of £67, 2s. 5d., being such portion of the ground rent due at Lady Day [17] 1841, as accrued due before possession was given up. The agreement however affords no foundation for this claim, and I am of opinion that it cannot be sustained.

Fourthly. Mr. Walker claims to have a lien on the deeds, not only for the costs of completing the purchase, but also for a general bill of costs, which he states that he has against English.

The replication to his answer was withdrawn, and the Plaintiff has examined him as a witness. The consequence of which is, that his answer must be taken to be true, and the Plaintiff must pay him his costs of the cause. He has further contended, that he is entitled to have his claim allowed to its fullest extent; but any question on the subject is, in this case, precluded by the form of the answer, in which Mr. Walker says that he claims such a lien as the Court shall consider him entitled to; and having considered what he is entitled to, I am of opinion that his lien extends only to the costs incurred in completing the purchase for which the deeds were placed in his hands.

The Plaintiff is now seeking the benefit of the purchase in which he acquiesced from the beginning, and he cannot have the remaining purchase-money without paying to Mr. Walker the proper costs of the transaction by which it was made available; but to extend the lien further, would be to allow Mr. Walker to profit by the fraud of his own client, and that, in a case where a little proper attention on his own part, would have procured him full information of all the circumstances. I think that Mr. Walker is entitled to his costs of the suit, only because the Plaintiff has thought proper to examine him as a witness.

[18] Mr. Walker alleging that the purchase-money to be paid by the club was in part for the relinquishment by English of his business as an hotel-keeper, has endeavoured to resist the Plaintiff's claim, on the ground that his lien extends only to so much of the purchase-money as ought to be attributed to the leasehold interest in the premises; but in the circumstances of this case, I am of opinion that no such distinction can be maintained.

An account must be taken of what remains due to the Plaintiff on his mortgage; and in taking the account credit must be given for the sum of £300 paid on the 19th of November 1840. An account must also be taken of what remains due from the trustees of the Conservative Club for the purchase-money. The costs of the suit and the costs of Mr. Walker in completing the purchase must be taxed: what is due to the trustees and Mr. Walker must be paid; the residue must be paid to the Plaintiff towards satisfaction of his mortgage; and on such payment, Mr. Walker must deliver up the deeds to the trustees of the club.

[19] THE BARNSELEY CANAL COMPANY v. TWIBELL. May 11, Nov. 17, 18, 1843;
Jan. 18, 1844.

A canal company was authorised, by its Act, to purchase the coal, which the safety of the canal required to be left unworked. The purchase of part was delayed many years, and in the meantime a lease had been granted by the owner to a coal worker. The company purchased the interest of the owner. Held, that the coal worker was also entitled to compensation.

No equity can be founded on an allegation that a Court legally constituted is not properly competent to decide questions within its jurisdiction; and where the Legislature has given jurisdiction to a Court provided by the Act, and has made its decision final, if any inconvenience arises from the legal exercise of the jurisdiction, the Legislature alone can supply a remedy.

A Canal Act provided, that in case the company and the coal owner could not agree as to the amount of compensation for the coal taken for the purposes of the canal, it should be settled by a jury summoned by the Commissioners, whose verdict was "to be conclusive, and should not be removed, by certiorari or other process whatever, into any of the Courts of Record at Westminster, or any other Court." A bill was filed, praying an injunction to restrain proceedings before a jury, on the ground that the Defendant was entitled to no compensation, and that the special jurisdiction provided by the Act was not so constituted as to be likely to come to a just conclusion. Held, that the Plaintiffs were not entitled to an injunction if the Defendant was entitled to any compensation, the amount of which had to be ascertained; but whether this Court had any jurisdiction to interfere in the matter, if it had clearly appeared that the Defendant was entitled to no compensation, quære.

Where a Plaintiff obtains an injunction of affidavits, the Defendant is not wrong in meeting the case by affidavits on a motion to dissolve, although the point might be determined shortly by filing a demurrer.

The case came twice before the Court: in the first instance, to obtain, and on the second to dissolve, an injunction to restrain the Defendant, his solicitor, &c., from appearing or producing any evidence before a jury which had been summoned, under a Canal Act, to assess the compensation for the coal which was required to be left unworked for the safety of the canal.

By an Act passed in the thirty-third year of the reign of George III. (33 G. 3, c. 110), the company were incorporated, for the purpose of making a canal from the river Calder to or near to the town of Barnsley, in Yorkshire, with the usual powers to take and hold land; and, in order to fix the price which was to be paid by the company for any lands which they should require, in case the company and the owners should not agree as to the amount of purchase-money, Commissioners were appointed, who were to call a meeting and decide all such differences, [20] upon being requested to do so either by the company or by the owners of the land; and, if either of the parties refused to submit to the decision of the Commissioners, they were empowered to issue a warrant to the Sheriff of the county of York, commanding him to empanel a jury to assess the amount of compensation to be paid by the company; and it was declared that the verdict of the jury should be conclusive, and should not be removed, by certiorari or other process whatever, into any of the Courts of Record at Westminster, or any other Court. By the fortieth section it was declared, that the Act was not to prejudice or affect the right of the lord of any manor, or any other owner, to the minerals under any of the land taken by the company; but that it should be lawful for them (subject to the restrictions thereafter contained) to work and get the minerals, not thereby injuring, prejudicing, or obstructing the said canal.

The Plaintiffs were to be at liberty to inspect the workings: and it was further enacted, that "if the owner or worker, owners or workers of any coal or other mine or mines should, in pursuing such mine or mines, work so near, in the opinion of the said company of proprietors, to the said intended canal, as to endanger or damage the same, or, in the opinion of the said owner or worker, owners or workers of the said mine or mines, to endanger or damage the further working thereof, then, it should be lawful for the said company of proprietors to treat and agree with the owner or worker, owners or workers, for all such coal or other minerals as might be near or under the said intended canal, as should be thought proper to be left for the security or preservation of the said intended canal, or other works, or mine or mines as aforesaid." And in case the company and the worker of any such mine could not agree as to the amount of compensation, it [21] was to be settled by a jury, as before mentioned; and, upon payment of the money, the owner or worker of such mine was to be perpetually restrained from working such mine within those limits.

The canal had been long completed, and passed for 495 yards through the estate of Mr. Beaumont, in the township of Barugh. The land itself under which it passed was purchased by the Plaintiffs many years ago; but by the Canal Act above referred to, the coal mines and the coals under the canal were reserved to the owners, their heirs and assigns, who were to be at liberty to work the mines so as not to injure the canal.

The Plaintiffs did not point out what quantity of coal they required to be left for the safety of the canal, nor did they take any steps to ascertain the compensation payable in respect thereof.

In this state of things, in the year 1830, Mr. Beaumont, the then owner of the coal in this place, agreed to let to Frank Burton and the Defendant all the coal on the north and south sides of the canal, on the one side up to the canal, and on the other side up to the canal and towing-path, at a certain rent, and under an obligation, on the part of the lessees, to work a certain quantity annually. Burton and the Defendant thereby acquired an interest in the coal comprised in the lease, and which interest afterwards became vested in the Defendant alone.

In consequence of the state of the workings in 1839, Mr. Brakenridge, the solicitor of Mr. Beaumont, requested the Plaintiffs to state what reservation of coal they desired to have made for the safety of their canal. This request was often repeated by Mr. Brakenridge, and in [22] February 1840 the Defendant gave notice to the Plaintiffs, that he was willing to enter into an agreement for such coal as they might require to be left for the security and preservation of the canal.

Mr. Beaumont was entitled to the coal under the canal and towing-path absolutely, but he was not so entitled to the coal under the land on each side of the canal and towing-path; for as to that, the Defendant Mr. Twibell had, under his lease or agreement, a right to get it, upon paying Mr. Beaumont the due consideration.

The Plaintiffs, on the 9th of March 1840, informed Mr. Brakenridge that they were advised to purchase from Mr. Beaumont, coal to the extent of eight yards in breadth, on each side of the canal and towing-path. At this time the Plaintiffs seemed to have supposed that all the coal which they might require to be left for the safety of the canal had been reserved out of the Defendant's lease; but this being explained, by a letter of Mr. Brakenridge, dated on the same 9th of March 1840, the Plaintiffs afterwards, on the 11th of March 1840, served the Defendant with a notice, not to work the coal within eight yards of either side of the canal and towing-path, and required him to state his claim, if he had any, to compensation.

The Defendant, in August 1840, stated the sum of £551, as the amount of his claim to compensation, and the Plaintiffs, with full knowledge of this claim of the Defendant, treated separately with Mr. Beaumont for a settlement of his claim, and, after long delay, the interest of Mr. Beaumont in the coal under the canal and towing-path, and under the eight yards on each side of them, was purchased by and conveyed to the Plaintiffs for the sum of £756.

[23] It was in dispute, but, from the evidence, the Court was of opinion, that the sum of £756 did not include any compensation to which the Defendant was entitled in respect of his claim; that it was not so intended by Mr. Beaumont, or Mr. Brakenridge who acted for him, and that there was nothing to shew that it was so understood by the Plaintiffs, or by Mr. Foljambe who acted for them. On the contrary, it appeared that the Plaintiffs made their bargain with Mr. Beaumont, with full knowledge that the Defendant's claim was outstanding and unaffected by their arrangement with Mr. Beaumont.

The Plaintiffs, though fully aware of the Defendant's claim, made frequent attempts to postpone and evade the consideration of it; but at length the Defendant succeeded in bringing the matter before the Commissioners under the Act of Parliament, with the view of procuring the proper steps to be taken to ascertain, in the manner directed by the Act, the amount of the compensation which might be due to him.

This bill was filed on the 8th of May 1843, praying a declaration that the Defendant was not entitled to any compensation, and that he might be restrained from proceeding to take any steps for the purpose of ascertaining the amount of such compensation.

On the 11th of May 1843 the case was brought forward on an application for an injunction; but the evidence being then imperfect, and one of the parties refusing to consent to an arrangement which would leave the matter in statu quo until the case could be brought before the Court in a more perfect form—

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS granted the injunction, giving liberty to apply to dissolve it, and imposing on [24] the Plaintiffs the terms that the Defendant should not be prejudiced, in case he should be ultimately allowed to proceed.

On the 17th of November 1843 the Defendant moved to dissolve the injunction. The effect of the argument on the motion for the injunction, and on the motion to dissolve, is stated together.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh and Mr. W. T. S. Daniel, for the Plaintiffs, in support of the motion for an injunction, and in opposition to the motion to dissolve it.

The whole of the coal has been purchased by the company from Beaumont, and fully paid for; the Defendant, therefore, who is Beaumont's lessee, has no right to any compensation. After the passing of the Act of Parliament, whoever took from Beaumont, took subject to the rights conferred on the Plaintiffs by that Act; thenceforward, Beaumont could only demise subject to the rights of the company; and it was not competent for him to create new and additional interests which would prejudice or defeat the rights of the company. The Defendant insists, that the company are bound to pay, not only the full value of the coal as lying in the seam, but also, in addition, the value which he might make by working it; the Act, however, directs compensation for the coal only, and not for any profits to be made from the sale of it, after it has been removed from the mine. If the Defendant is not entitled to compensation, the Commissioners have no right to summon a jury. As to Martin v. Porter (5 Mee. & Wels. 351), which will be relied [25] on, Parke Justice, in a cause of Wood v. Morwood, lately tried at Derby, held, that the principle of that case only applied to cases, where the party taking the coal had no title at all.

Secondly, The construction and nature of the jurisdiction appointed by the Act for determining the question of compensation, renders it quite incompetent to determine the difficult questions of law arising in this case. Here the Commissioners, mere country gentlemen, are to preside and direct a jury in matters of law, to lay down to them the construction of this Act of Parliament, and the law of the case as regards the Defendant's right to compensation, the effect of the absolute purchase from Beaumont, and of the Defendant's laches in not prosecuting his claim until after payment to Beaumont. These are not matters which it was ever intended that the Commissioners and jury should decide; and where the remedy to be obtained from another jurisdiction is incomplete, this Court will assume jurisdiction (Redesdale, 112). The damage which may be sustained by the Plaintiffs will be irremediable, in case the trial proceeds; for whatever errors in law may be committed, the Plaintiffs will be left without redress. On that ground, at all events, this Court ought to interfere, and prevent the proceedings going on until it sees that complete justice can be done to the Plaintiffs.

Mr. G. Turner and Mr. Glasse, for the Defendant. The Defendant is entitled to a valuable interest, under his lease from Mr. Beaumont. If, for the accommodation of the Plaintiffs he is deprived of that interest, he is entitled to some compensation for his loss, and which com-[26]-pensation is to be determined by a jury in the way pointed out by the Act. The Act of Parliament passed so long back as the year 1793, and the Plaintiffs have postponed and neglected availing themselves of the power, given to them by that Act, of purchasing the coal in question: they are therefore liable to pay compensation for every existing interest, though it may have arisen in the interval.

The payment was made to Mr. Beaumont after notice of the Defendant's rights: no payment to him could prejudice the rights of the Defendant; and the compensation was, in fact, made in respect of Beaumont's interest only: Twibell's interest was not included in the amount, and has never been paid for.

The Plaintiffs have no right to complain of the imperfection of the special tribunal, appointed by their own Act, for finally determining the questions between them and the owners, for they themselves have selected it. This is an attempt to evade the Act, and to withdraw the consideration of the question from the only tribunal which has complete jurisdiction to decide. If there be no jurisdiction to determine the question, according to the mode pointed out by the Act, then the whole proceeding will be a nullity, and no injury will be done to the Plaintiffs; for where a limited tribunal takes upon itself to exercise a jurisdiction which does not belong to it, its decision amounts to nothing, and does not create any necessity for an appeal; The Attorney-General v. Lord Hotham (Turn. & Russ. 219); but by staying the trial, the question will be excluded.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS, on the motion to dissolve the injunction, reserved his judgment.

[27] The following cases were also cited: The Queen v. The Bristol and Exeter Railway Company (1 Railway Cases, 99), Martin v. Porter (5 Mee. & Wels. 351), *Barnard v. Jan. 18, 1844. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The owners and workers of coal in this township do not appear to have had any information as to their liabilities, except that which they might have obtained from the Canal Act, which reserved to the owners the liberty of working the coals, not thereby injuring the canal. From the correspondence which has been proved in this case, it seems, that the Plaintiffs did not think it incumbent upon them to point out what quantity of coal they required to be left for the safety of the canal, but rather desired the worker to go on at his own peril, and either leave the coal, receiving no compensation for it, or run the hazard of doing an injury to the canal, for which he might be made answerable. If this was the intention of the Plaintiffs, it was defeated by the proper attention given to the subject by Mr. Brakenridge, the agent of Mr. Beaumont.

It was argued for the Plaintiffs, at the Bar, that the Court, which under the Act is entrusted with the duty of [28] ascertaining what satisfaction is to be paid to the coal worker, is not so constituted as to be likely to come to a just conclusion. But I agree with the argument of the Defendant on this point. No equity can be founded on an allegation, that a Court legally constituted is not properly competent to decide questions within its jurisdiction. The Legislature has given the jurisdiction to the Court provided by the Act, and has made its decision final. If any inconvenience arises from the legal exercise of the jurisdiction the Legislature alone can apply a remedy.

It was next argued, that the Plaintiffs had, in fact, paid the whole value of the coal to Mr. Beaumont, and that nothing more can be required from them. Having, as they say, paid to Mr. Beaumont the full value of the coal in the bed, they are under no obligation to give to the Defendant, any compensation for profit which he might have made by selling the coal, which he intended to obtain under his lease; and the rather, because the Act of Parliament informed the Defendant of the Plaintiffs' powers, and that he was not to work so as to injure the canal. It was further argued, that the Court to be constituted under the Act, is only to try and determine the amount of compensation, in cases where it is agreed, or in some way decided, that some compensation is to be paid, and that the Court is not competent to decide the question whether any or no compensation is to be paid.

I consider it to be clear, that the Plaintiffs are not entitled to an injunction, if the Defendant be entitled to any compensation, the amount of which has to be ascertained; and I am of opinion, that the Defendant, under his lease, had an interest in the coal under the eight yards on each side of the canal and towing-path: he had a right to get the coal, to sell it for what he [29] could, paying the sums which became due to Mr. Beaumont. Upon this dealing there might have been profit, which he is prevented from making by the notice of the Plaintiffs and the powers given to them by the Act. The value of the coal in the bed, or the price paid to the coal owner, can be no compensation to the coal worker for the loss of the interest which he had acquired.

The ground on which it is argued that he should have no compensation is, that when he took his lease he had notice, or was informed by the Act of Parliament, that he was not to work the coal so as to injure the canal. But at the time when he took his lease he had no notice that the Plaintiffs would require eight yards of breadth of coal to be left on each side of the canal and towing-path. The coal under the canal and towing-path was not comprised in his lease, and he had no interest in it; but he did not know that the Plaintiffs would require more or less than eight yards, or indeed any breadth of coal on each side of the canal and towing-path. He knew that he was not, by working his coal, to injure the canal, and it does not appear that he did so; he also knew that the Plaintiffs were entitled to inspect his workings, and if he worked contrary to the directions of the Act, were entitled, at his expence, to make the repairs rendered necessary by his improper working; but as the Plaintiffs did not think fit, for so many years, to give any notice as to the quantity of coal, if any, which they required to be left for the safety of the canal, it does not appear, why the Defendant might not enter into an agreement for working and getting all the coal comprised in his lease.

I think it very probable, that the powers given by the Act might have been so exercised as to enable the [30] Plaintiffs to buy the coal under the canal and towing-path and a reasonable distance on each side of them, at the value of the coal in the bed; but for reasons of their own, they probably desired to delay the notices as long as they could; they left it quite uncertain whether they would or would not require any coal to be left for the safety of the canal, and I think that they cannot justly complain, of any rights which the coal owners may have conferred upon the coal workers, during the time that their notices were delayed for their own convenience. Under the circumstances of this case, I am of opinion, that the Defendant lawfully acquired an interest in the coal which the Plaintiffs desire to be left for the safety of the canal.

I do not consider what may be the value of that interest, or what may be the proper mode of computing it. I am of opinion that the Defendant has an interest, in respect of which he is entitled to receive satisfaction, and that the amount of the satisfaction which he is to receive is to be assessed and determined in the manner directed by the Act.

Under these circumstances, I have not thought it necessary to give any opinion upon the question of jurisdiction, in case it had clearly appeared that the Defendant was not entitled to any compensation; and for the reasons which I have stated, I dissolve the injunction which has been granted to restrain the Defendant's proceedings.

On the application to dissolve the injunction the Defendant had filed a vast number of affidavits, thirty in number, and it was objected by the Plaintiffs that an unnecessary expence had been incurred by the De-[31]-fendant, and that he ought to have filed a simple demurrer, by which the point might have been determined.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS said, With regard to the affidavits, I do not think that parties against whom an injunction is applied for and obtained, upon evidence on one side, are under any obligation whatever to demur, if by abstaining from doing so and by filing affidavits, they think they can place their case in a better view before the Court. I think the affidavits in this case were of this character; for although I agree with the argument of the counsel for the company, that the real question in issue in the cause might have been decided upon demurrer; still, if an injunction is applied for and obtained on affidavits on one side, I cannot say that the other party is wrong, in endeavouring to improve his case by stating facts on affidavits.

The injunction was dissolved; and the Defendant was to be placed, as nearly as possible, in the same position as he was in when the injunction was granted: and he was not to be obliged to serve the notices required by the Act, or to begin his proceedings de novo.

NOTE.—The company appealed from this decision, but it was affirmed by the Lord Chancellor on the 23d of June 1844.

[32] REED v. O'BRIEN. Nov. 4, 8, 1843.

Where a voluntary trust is perfected, the settlor is not a necessary party to a suit by the cestui que trust against the trustee, to compel its performance.

Where a demurrer is overruled, the Court will not give the Plaintiff the costs, if the statements of the bill are vague and uncertain.

The bill stated, that General Maurice de Lacy, who was born in Ireland, but had become domiciled in Russia, had remitted to Ireland several sums of money, for the benefit of the families or descendants of his deceased sisters, Johanna O'Brien and Benedicta Murphy, and that such remittances were divided amongst such families or descendants per stirpes, grandchildren taking the place of and representing such of their parents (the children of the deceased sisters) as were dead.

The bill then stated, that in 1815, the Defendant O'Brien, claiming to be a relation, went to Russia to General de Lacy, and that afterwards (but at what time the bill did not state), the Defendant O'Brien received from, or by the directions of the said General Maurice de Lacy, divers large sums of money, or the securities for the same, which were afterwards realized, and the proceeds received by the said Patrick O'Brien, in trust for, and for the benefit of the families or descendants, in this kingdom, of the said Mrs. Johanna O'Brien and Mrs. Benedicta Murphy, equally and per stirpes, grandchildren taking in manner aforesaid. That the said Patrick O'Brien did not divide or pay the same, or any part thereof, to such descendants respectively, or their representatives, but retained and applied the same to his own uses and purposes; and that among other sums so received by Patrick O'Brien from General Maurice de Lacy, were three several sums of 50,000 silver roubles, 60,000 silver roubles, and £1931, 14s. 2d. sterling.

[33] That in the course of the year 1817 General Maurice de Lacy delivered to Patrick O'Brien, at different times, divers sums of money, amounting to the said sum of 50,000 silver roubles, in trust for and for the benefit aforesaid. That Patrick O'Brien accepted the said trust, and that he thereafter falsely represented to the said General Maurice de Lacy, or led him to suppose, that he had distributed this sum among the relations. That he accepted the said trusts, and wrote to persons in Ireland, stating that he had received the two last-mentioned sums, on the trusts and for the benefit aforesaid.

That in 1818 General de Lacy delivered to O'Brien 60,000 silver roubles, in trust for and for the benefit of the said descendants of Johanna O'Brien and Benedicta Murphy, and of Mary O'Brien, in three equal shares per stirpes as aforesaid. And that Patrick O'Brien also, about the same period, received from General Maurice de Lacy, in trust for and for the benefit of the families or descendants of the sisters, Johanna and Benedicta, per stirpes, in manner and proportion as aforesaid, a sum of £1931, 14s. 2d.

That in 1837 a part of the trust funds was assigned to the Plaintiffs, as trustees for the issue of the marriage between Charles Nash and Mary de Lacy his wife, who was one of the descendants.

The bill sought to recover these sums, and prayed an account of them; but neither the issue of this marriage, nor the legal personal representatives of General de Lacy, were made parties to this suit.

The principal Defendants demurred for want of equity, and, ore tenus, for want of parties.

[34] Mr. Teed and Mr. Bacon, in support of the demurrer, contended that the circumstances stated in the bill shewed a mere agency, and not a trust. That the general, according to the statements of the bill, had delivered monies to the Defendant as his agent, for distribution amongst his relations; but that this did not give to such relations the right of insisting on its being handed over to them. That O'Brien had no trust to perform to the Plaintiffs, and that his duty, at the utmost, was to hand over the funds; that for this he was accountable to the general only, whose agent he was, and not to the Plaintiffs, Adon v. Woodgate (2 Myl. & K. 492), Petre v. Espinasse (Ib. 496).

Secondly, that the statements were so vague and uncertain, that it was impossible to ascertain who were the persons for whose benefit the funds were intended. Wormald v. De Lisle (3 Beav. 18).

Thirdly, that as the legal personal representatives of the general, had a right to insist that the Defendant was merely an agent, and as they would become entitled to the fund, in case of failure or uncertainty of the objects, such representatives, and also the issue of the marriage of Charles Nash and his wife (who were the cestui que trust of the Plaintiffs) were necessary parties to this suit.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh and Mr. Anderson, in support of the bill. The bill expressly states that the Defendant received the money as trustee, and accepted the trust; this statement cannot, on demurrer, be contested. The case is not one of agency; it is a trust executed, which requires no aid of this Court to complete. M'Fadden v. Jenkyns (1 Hare, 458, and 1 Phil. 153).

[35] Secondly, the Court will take steps to ascertain the class of objects; and it has often taken upon itself the performance of trusts, where there have been gifts to a class equally uncertain as the present.

The representatives of the settlor are not necessary parties, for, from the moment the gift became irrevocable, the donor's interest ceased.

Mr. Teed, in reply.

Wheatley v. Purr (1 Keen, 551), Collinson v. Patrick (2 Keen, 123, and Com. Dig. Chancery, 4 W. a. 5), Bill v. Cureton (2 Myl. & K. 503), were cited.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS said he would look at the authorities before he decided the demurrer for want of equity.

As to the objection for want of parties, he said that if the bill, on the whole, contained an allegation of a valid trust, then there would be a cessation of property in the donor, and his representatives would not be necessary parties. As to the issue of Nash being made parties, it appeared that a specific interest in the property had been assigned for the benefit of persons who had not been brought before the Court; and that his present impression was, that they were necessary parties.

Nov. 8. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The bill states, that General Maurice de Lacy, who was domiciled in Russia, had remitted to Ireland several [36] sums of money for the benefit of the families or descendants of his deceased sisters, Johanna O'Brien and Benedicta Murphy, and that such remittances were to be divided amongst such families or descendants per stirpes, grandchildren taking in the place of, and representing such of their parents, the children of the deceased sisters, as were dead.

The bill then states, that at a time not distinctly mentioned, the Defendant Patrick O'Brien received from General Maurice de Lacy divers large sums of money, in trust for and for the benefit of the families or descendants of Johanna O'Brien and Benedicta Murphy, equally and per stirpes, grandchildren taking in manner aforesaid; and that among other sums so received were 50,000 silver roubles and £1931, 14s. 3d. current money of Great Britain, or a sum of Russian money equal in value thereto; and that the Defendant Patrick O'Brien accepted the said trust, and represented to General Maurice de Lacy that he had distributed the money accordingly.

The bill further states, that in 1818 General Maurice de Lacy delivered to the Defendant Patrick O'Brien 60,000 silver roubles, in trust for and for the benefit of the said descendants of Johanna O'Brien and Benedicta Murphy, and of Mary O'Brien, in three equal shares per stirpes as aforesaid; and that the Defendant Patrick O'Brien also, about the same period, received from or by the directions of General Maurice de Lacy, in trust for and for the benefit of the families or descendants of the sisters Johanna and Benedicta per stirpes, in manner and proportions aforesaid, a sum of £1931, 14s. 2d.

The bill alleges that the Defendant Patrick O'Brien accepted the said trusts, and wrote to certain persons [37] in Ireland, stating that he had received the two last-mentioned sums, on the trusts and for the benefit aforesaid, and that he placed with Sir M. Tierney a large part of the trust monies, and that the said Sir M. Tierney accepted and received the same with knowledge of the trusts, and afterwards invested £2558, part thereof, in the purchase of 3½ per cent. annuities.

These allegations are admitted for the purpose of the demurrer; but it is argued, that although a trust be stated, yet, taking the statements of the alleged trust, together with the context of the bill, it appears, that the real transaction meant to be alleged was a mere agency, and not a trust to be executed in this Court, and, further, that if it be a trust, the nature and purposes are stated with so much uncertainty, as to make it unfit for this Court to entertain the suit.

There is, indeed, a considerable, and perhaps an intended ambiguity in the statements of the bill; but, on carefully reading the whole, and being, I confess, unable to understand why some of the statements are introduced, I cannot say that there is anything irreconcilable with the distinct allegations of trust; and if a trust should ultimately be established, I think that the nature and objects of it are not stated with such vagueness and uncertainty as to make it impracticable for the Court to execute it. The statements are indeed not satisfactorily made, and they are such, as to make it probable that there may be great, if not insuperable, difficulties in establishing the case alleged by the Plaintiffs; but, taking the allegations as they stand admitted on this occasion, I think that the demurrer for want of equity must be overruled.

[38] The Defendants demurred ore tenus for want of parties, and stated several objections. Having regard to the allegations of the bill, I do not think, that as the case is now stated, the legal personal representative of General de Lacy is a necessary party. But the Plaintiffs are only assignees of a share once vested in Johanna Pierce, in trust for persons who are not parties; and it does not appear to me, that the suit can proceed in the absence of these cestuis que trust.

The trusts are alleged to have been created in or about 1817 or 1818, for the benefit of the families or descendants of the sisters of General de Lacy.

Johanna O'Brien, one of the sisters, died before 1795, leaving a daughter Johanna Pierce, who died in 1821, leaving children. Johanna Pierce was living in 1818, and, according to the statement in the bill, was entitled to a share of the trust funds, and upon her death, this share would pass to her legal personal representative.

Mary de Lacy Pierce was one of the children of Johanna Pierce. In April 1836 she married Charles Nash, and in April 1837, it is alleged, that a deed was executed, whereby John Fitzmaurice Pierce (the surviving husband of Johanna Pierce), and other persons, assigned to the Plaintiff O'Connor and George Pierce a share of the 60,000 silver roubles, part of the alleged trust funds, in trust solely for the issue of the marriage of Charles Nash and Mary de Lacy Pierce. Such, at least, appears to me to be the effect of the statement of this deed which is in the bill; but the statement is in itself not only ambiguous, but so made as to throw some doubt upon the nature of the principal trust alleged in the bill.

[39] It is subsequently alleged, that John Pierce (meaning, I presume, John Fitzmaurice Pierce) became the legal personal representative of his deceased wife

Johanna, and that by a subsequent deed, the Plaintiff Reed was substituted as a trustee for George Pierce.

This bill is filed by Reed and O'Connor, the trustees of the post-nuptial settlement of Nash and his wife; and it being stated that the settlement is made solely for the benefit of the issue of the marriage, it is said, that there is issue of the marriage; but they are not parties to the suit, and they may file a bill against these Defendants in respect of the same matters, after an adjudication in this suit in their absence. I am therefore of opinion, that they must be made parties before the cause can proceed.

Allow the demurrer ore tenus for want of parties without costs, and let the Plaintiffs have leave to amend.

I wish to add, that the frame of this bill is such, that having thought it right to overrule the demurrer for want of equity, I must nevertheless refuse to the Plaintiffs the costs of that demurrer.

[40] BLISS v. PUTNAM. Nov. 3, 1843.

[For subsequent proceedings, see 29 Beav. 20.]

A. B., being entitled to a legacy, and being indebted to C. D., by a deed which represented that it was "unincumbered," assigned it to C. D. upon trust, to retain a moiety, and as to the residue in trust for A. B. The fund was in Court, and liable to legacy duty. Held, first, that C. D.'s moiety must bear its share of the legacy duty; and, secondly, that C. D. was not entitled, as against A. B.'s share, to the costs of the proceedings to clear and ascertain the fund and obtain payment.

Under the will of a testator, who died in 1838, John C. Putnam was entitled to a life interest in a moiety of the testator's residuary estate.

John C. Putnam, being, together with his co-partner, indebted to Messrs. Wild & Co. in the sum of £4000, executed an indenture, dated in September 1838, and thereby, after reciting the will, and that he had proposed to pay £2500 to Messrs. Wild in discharge of his individual liability, and that he had represented, that his "life interest was not then incumbered," and had proposed to secure the £2500 as after mentioned, John C. Putnam assigned to Messrs. Wild all the interest, &c., thereafter to arise from one moiety of the testator's residuary estate, upon trust to retain a moiety of the monies received by them, until £2500 should be paid, and as to the residue of the monies in trust for John C. Putnam.

John C. Putnam died in July 1840; his interest thereupon ceased, and it was found that the moiety of his portion of the income was insufficient to discharge the £2500. The whole was in Court, and legacy duty, at the rate of 3 per cent., was payable on the amount. Messrs. Wild & Co. had incurred the costs of a petition presented by them, and of certain proceedings before the Master to inquire what was due under the deed, and what portion of the fund in Court had arisen from income accruing after the date of the deed.

[41] A petition was now presented by the executors of John C. Putnam for payment to them of the money in Court, after providing for the claim of Wild & Co.

The questions were, first, whether the moiety to which Messrs. Wild were entitled, was to bear its share of the legacy duty; and, secondly, whether Messrs. Wild's costs ought to be paid out of the portion of the fund belonging to the executors of John C. Putnam.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Goodeve, for the executors of John C. Putnam.

Mr. Turner and Mr. Stevens, for Messrs. Wild & Co., contended, that as John C. Putnam had represented his life-estate to be unincumbered, and had agreed to assign an unincumbered moiety, his share ought to bear the whole amount of the duty; and, secondly, that Messrs. Wild were entitled to the costs incurred in obtaining the fund, especially as they were to some extent trustees.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The question is, what is to be done as to the legacy duty and the costs. The legacy duty being a Government charge on the fund, does not, I think, come within the view of the parties under the word "incumbrance." It appears, therefore, to me that the legacy duty is payable out of the whole fund.

As to the costs, I expected some authority would have been cited. If none can be found, my impression is, that the second moiety is not applicable to the payment of the costs, because by the deed it is made the property of John C. Putnam himself. Each party must bear his own costs.

[42] NICHOLLS v. STRETTON. Dec. 5, 1843.

[S. C. at Law, 10 Q. B. 346; 11 Jur. 1008. See Baines v. Geary, 1877, 35 Ch. D. 157; Baker v. Hedgecock, 1886, 39 Ch. D. 523.]

A. on being artioled to B., covenanted not to be concerned for any of B.'s clients, and to forfeit £100 for any such breach. A. after being admitted, acted in contravention of this covenant. He was restrained by injunction.

In January 1838 the Plaintiff took the Defendant as an artioled clerk for five years without premium. At the same time, an indenture was executed between them, whereby the Defendant covenanted that he would not, during the said term of five years, nor at any time after the expiration of such term, either directly or indirectly, interfere, or intermeddle with, or be concerned, as attorney, agent, or otherwise, for any person who had already been, or who should, from time to time thereafter, become or be the client or correspondent in business of or with the Plaintiff, or any partner or partners he might admit to a share or shares with him, or any person or persons to whom he might sell or assign the whole or any part of his business or profession of attorney, solicitor, and conveyancer. And that he the Defendant would not act as partner, clerk, or assistant with or to any person or persons who should interfere or intermeddle as aforesaid. And in case the Defendant should commit any breach or breaches of his said covenants, promises, and agreements, he should forfeit and pay, as and for liquidated damages, the sum of £100 for every such breach. And it was thereby declared, that each day's repetition or continuance of any interference or intermeddling, as aforesaid, should be deemed a fresh breach of covenant, and incur a new and separate penalty and right of action. Provided nevertheless, that the same covenant was not to restrict the Defendant from being concerned in business for any of the connections of the said Defendant, who might, through his introduction, become clients of the Plaintiff, and being on [43] the books of the Plaintiff, admitted by him to have been so introduced by the said Defendant. And it was thereby expressly declared, that it was the true intent and meaning of the now stating deed and of the said articles of clerkship, that the Plaintiff should not be obliged to continue the said Charles Marston Stretton in his service, against his will, during the whole or any part of the said term of five years, but that the said Defendant should and would, notwithstanding the said articles of clerkship, at any time quit the service of the Plaintiff, on receiving from the Plaintiff one week's notice in writing so to do, the Plaintiff thereby agreeing to assign the said articles of clerkship to such other attorney as the Defendant might, in such case, require, but such assignment of the said articles of clerkship, was not to affect or invalidate the covenants, promises, and agreements therein contained.

At the expiration of the articles in 1843, the Defendant left the Plaintiff and was admitted an attorney.

The Plaintiff, finding that the Defendant transacted business for some country solicitors who had been his clients and connections, filed this bill, praying that the Defendant might be perpetually restrained by injunction from interfering or intermeddling with, or being concerned, as an attorney, agent, or otherwise, for any client or correspondent of the Plaintiff, or of the Plaintiff and his partners, in the Plaintiff's business of an attorney, solicitor, or conveyancer.

A motion was now made for an injunction in the terms of the prayer.

[44] Mr. Pemberton Leigh and Mr. Goodeve, for the Plaintiff, relied on Whitaker

v. Howe (3 Beavan, 383. And see Davis v. Mason, 5 Term R. 118, Hitchcock v. Coker, 6 Adol. & El. 438; Archer v. Marsh, ib. 959; Horner v. Graves, 7 Bing. 735; Proctor v. Sargent, 2 M. & Gr. 20; Ward v. Byrne, 5 Mee. & W. 548; Hinde v. Gray, 1 Man. & G. 195; Wallis v. Day, 2 Mee. & W. 273).

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Rogers, for the Defendant.

The covenant is in restraint of trade, and so oppressive in its nature, that this Court, if asked, would not interfere and direct specific performance, but would leave the Plaintiff to his action for damages. If so, it should not grant the injunction. The Defendant was liable to be turned away at a week's notice, and yet, by the strict terms of the deed, if the Plaintiff had ceased to be employed by a client before the Defendant was born, and such client never intended to employ the Plaintiff again, still the Defendant was to be precluded from being concerned for him, and no injury might be done to the Plaintiff. It might be most detrimental to third parties to prevent the Defendant acting for them.

The deed was never executed by the Plaintiff, and there is, therefore, no mutuality.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. In all cases of this kind, where an injunction is asked to restrain a party from exercising his professional employment, the Court has always had some reluctance in acting, for not only is it, to some extent, a restriction on trade, but it may also have the effect of depriving third parties of the services of those in whom alone they may [46] have confidence. The question has arisen not only in the case of solicitors, but in that of medical men. There was a case before Lord Eldon, of a medical man who had covenanted not to be employed for certain persons, and those persons being taken ill, it was a case of great hardship to say that he should not attend them. It must be admitted that this Court cannot interfere in these cases without the possibility of injury to third parties. That difficulty, however, has been passed over, and the Court has repeatedly exercised its jurisdiction in cases of this nature.

It is no answer to say, in this case, that the client would not have employed the Plaintiff in the particular case referred to. Any interference with his clients was one of the very things which the Plaintiff, when he took the Defendant into his office, was desirous of guarding against.

I do not see any ground on which I can say that this is a contract which this Court will not enforce. The perseverance of Stretton in acting in this manner and in availing himself of the introduction he accidentally acquired in the Plaintiff's office, has made this application necessary. I must grant this injunction; the only question is, as to the terms in which it should be expressed.

NOTE.—An appeal was presented, and a case was directed to a Court of law. [See 10 Q. B. 346.]

[46] BACON v. BARNETT. Nov. 25, Dec. 5, 1843.

The serjeant-at-arms returned cepi corpus sed languidus. There being ground for believing that the latter part of the return was untrue, the Court ordered that the serjeant-at-arms should bring the Defendant up on a given day, unless he should on the previous day, shew cause to the contrary.

The Defendant obtained time to answer on the terms of the 21st Order of December 1833 (Ordines Can. 50) consenting to a serjeant-at-arms.

The Defendant having neglected to put in his answer, the serjeant-at-arms went against him on the 7th of November, and on the 16th of November he returned in effect cepi corpus sed languidus, and that he could not be brought up without danger.

Mr. G. L. Russell now moved that the serjeant-at-arms might bring the Defendant up. The application was supported by affidavits tending to shew, that, at the time of the return, the Defendant was in health, and following his usual occupations and pleasures. He cited Miles v. Lingham (7 Ves. 230).

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. That affidavit may be true; yet we all know health to be so precarious, that it is possible, that to bring him up at the present moment might be attended with the risk of his life. The order I shall make is that the serjeant-at-arms do bring him to the Bar on the 6th of December, unless on the 5th of December he shews cause to the contrary.

Dec. 5. The Defendant having put in his answer,

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS ordered his discharge upon payment of all the costs of the proceedings.

[47] THOMAS v. THOMAS. Dec. 7, 1843.

Under the 2d Order of the 11th of April 1842, the Court nominates the solicitor for the infant, and usually appoints the solicitor of the Suitors' Fund.

Mr. Piggott moved, under the 2d Order of the 11th of April 1842 (Ord. Can. 197) as amended by the 31st Order of the 26th of October 1842 (Ord. Can. 219), that Mr. R. G. a solicitor of this Honourable Court not towards the cause, might be appointed by this Court, guardian of the above-named Defendant John Thomas, an infant, under the age of twenty-one years for the purpose of putting in his answer.

The infant had appeared.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The Court makes the appointment, and usually appoints Mr. Johnson the solicitor of the Suitors' Fund. I will make the appointment, and a communication will then be made to the gentleman named in the notice of motion.

[48] ALCOCK v. SLOPER. Dec. 7, 1843.

Motion in a supplemental suit, to deposit documents with the Master, in whose office other documents had been deposited in the original suit, instead of with the Writ Clerks, though unopposed, was refused.

Under the decree in the original cause certain deeds had been deposited in the Master's office; others, relating to the same matter, had not been deposited.

A supplemental bill having been filed,

Mr. Kindersley moved for the production of the documents mentioned in the answer, and asked that they might be deposited in the Master's office with the other documents instead of being deposited with the Record and Writ Clerk.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh, for the Defendant, consented, but

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] objected to a departure from the usual practice, and he refused the application.

[49] HAVERGAL v. HARRISON. Dec. 11, 12, 1843.

[S. C. 13 L. J. Ch. 30; 7 Jur. 1100.]

Bequest to A. for life, and at her death for her brother and sister, and the testator's brothers and sisters equally. At the date of the will A. had one brother and sister, and the testator had three brothers and one sister. Held, that this was not a gift to an ascertained class, but to the brothers and sisters living at the date of the will. As to personal estate, the Court is bound by the terms of the will appearing on the probate; but if, on production of the original, a doubt exists as to the accuracy of the probate copy, the Court will give an opportunity to the parties to apply to the Ecclesiastical Court to set it right.

The testator, by his will dated in 1800, bequeathed as follows:—"I will and bequeath unto my beloved wife Mary Wilkis all my wordly effects, stock-in-trade, goods and chattels of every description unto me belonging, and at my beloved wife's departure for her brother and sister, and my brothers and sister, to have equal share of all my stock, goods and chattels."

At the time of making his will the testator had three brothers and one sister, of whom one brother only survived the testator.

At the date of the will his wife had one brother and the sister, of whom one sister alone survived.

The testator died in 1832, and his widow survived till 1839. Under these circumstances the question was, whether the brothers and sisters took in classes, so that the survivor took the whole residue, or whether by the death of four of them in the lifetime of the testator four-sixths lapsed.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh and Mr. Jervis, for the Plaintiffs, the next of kin, contended, that this was a gift to the individuals answering the description at the date of the will, and not a gift to a class to be ascertained at the death of the testator. That if he had intended a fluctuating body, he would have used the words "brothers and sisters" in both instances. They insisted therefore that four-sixths were undisposed of and had lapsed for the benefit of the widow and next of kin.

[50] Mr. Turner and Mr. Craig, for the personal representatives of the widow.

Mr. Kindersley, contra. The testator intended a class to be ascertained at a future period. The words in the original will are her brothers and sister. This did not answer the state of her family, for she had but one brother; the Court must act on the original document, and not on the probate, which is incorrect.

[THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. I am bound by the probate, but if, on the production of the original will, a doubt exists as to the accuracy of the probate copy, this Court will give an opportunity to the parties to apply to the Ecclesiastical Court to set it right.]

Even if the words were "brother and sister" still it would be plain that the intention of the testator was that all should take, and all brothers and sisters would have been let in under those words.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh, in reply. The testator must clearly have meant the individuals; his parents appear to have been married in 1755, and his mother had died in 1773.

Viner v. Francis (2 Cox, 190), Shuttleworth v. Greaves (4 Myl. & Cr. 35), Knight v. Gould (2 Myl. & K. 295). And see Harrison v. Harrison, 1 Russ. & M. 72).

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. The only question is this—whether the testator, in the use of a general description, has meant it to apply to [51] persons capable of being enumerated at the time, or to persons who might afterwards come into existence and could not therefore be enumerated till the death of the testator. His wife had one sister, and he had one sister: it is therefore difficult to suppose that he could have meant any other than the sister of himself and the sister of his wife; for if he intended to comprise persons not capable of being enumerated at that time, and persons capable of increase or decrease, it is inconceivable that he should have used the words in the singular number, and exactly applicable to the existing state of things.

If he meant by this description to enumerate the two particular sisters, how can we conceive, that, as to the brothers, he meant to comprise persons not then in existence, and who might afterwards come into esse?

I have a strong impression that there is a descriptio personarum at the time of the making of the will.

I think that the singular word "sister" shews that he did not intend a class incapable of being ascertained at the time, but individuals who could be then enumerated. I will consider my judgment.

Dec. 12. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I have read the case of Shuttleworth v. Greaves (4 My. & Cr. 35), and do not find in it any reason for altering the opinion which I expressed yesterday. The words "all and every my brothers and sisters," which were used by the testator in that cause, were comprehensive enough to include persons not capable of designation at the date of the will, and there was nothing to indicate the de-[52]-signation of any particular person; there were words creating a tenancy in common, and a limitation to executors, administrators, and assigns; and the question seems to have turned, partly upon those words and partly upon the limitation.

In this case, it appears to me that the use of the word "sister" in the singular number can only apply to the sister of his wife, and his own sister then in being, and that, consequently, as to them, there was a designatio personarum. The word "brothers," supposing it to have been used in the plural number in both cases, would have admitted of a more comprehensive construction; and in one case, it was not accordant with the fact as now ascertained to have been then existing. It creates some ambiguity, but not enough to overweigh the effect of the word "sister." It seems in the highest degree improbable that the testator should have meant to designate the sisters personally, and have meant an unascertained and unknown class of persons by the word "brothers" in the same clause.

I am of opinion that the brothers and sisters living at the date of the will were the legatees, and that the shares of such of them as died in the testator's lifetime lapsed and now belong to the next of kin.

[53] LADY HARTLAND v. ATCHERLEY. Jan. 11, 1844.

It is not the practice of the Court to appoint a person resident abroad to be guardian ad litem.

A. was found lunatic in Ireland, and B. was appointed his committee there. A. being a Defendant to a suit in England, an application was made that B. might be appointed guardian ad litem. Held, that the proper course was to get the Irish commission recorded in England, under the 1 W. 4, c. 65, s. 41, and then for the lunatic and committee to answer together.

The Defendant Lord Hartland was, in 1836, found lunatic by inquisition in Ireland, and Dennis Mahon was appointed committee of his person and estate. Lord Hartland and his committee were resident in Ireland.

Mr. W. H. Clarke moved, that Dennis Mahon might be assigned guardian of Lord Hartland to answer this bill, and defend the suit. He stated, that the usual course to obtain the appointment of a guardian ad litem to a lunatic Defendant was, to present a petition of course for a commission to assign a guardian; but he argued that the Court might dispense with a commission, as in the case of an infant resident abroad. (See Smith v. Palmer, 3 Beavan, 10; Shuttleworth v. Shuttleworth, 2 Hare, 147; Drant v. Vause, 2 Y. & C. (C. C.) 524.)

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS said, that it was not the practice of the Court to appoint a person resident abroad to be guardian, as the Court would have no power to compel obedience to its orders; that, unless the interests of the committee and lunatic were inconsistent, they ought to answer together; that here the parties might get the inquisition recorded in England under the Act (1 W. 4, c. 65, s. 41), and then the lunatic and committee could answer together.)

[54] ROBEY v. WHITEWOOD. Jan. 11, 1844.

The 1 W. 4, c. 36, s. xv. rule 17, does not authorize the Court to order that the costs of a Defendant's contempt for not answering, and who is too poor to pay them, may be costs in the cause.

The Defendant was committed for contempt in not answering. (5 Beav. 399.) He put in his answer, but being too poor to pay the costs of the contempt, it was moved on his behalf, that it might be ordered, under the Contempt Act (1 W. 4, c. 36), that the Defendant's costs of contempt might be made costs in the cause, and that the Defendant might forthwith be discharged without payment of costs.

Mr. Teed, in support of the application, referred to the 1 W. 4, c. 36, s. 15, rule 17, by which it is enacted "that in any other case of a commitment for contempt, not herein specially provided for, the Court may, upon any such application as last aforesaid, or upon any such report as aforesaid, make such order for the discharge of the prisoner, upon any such terms, and making, if the Court shall see fit, any costs in the cause, as to the Courts shall seem proper."

Mr. Shebbeare, contra, was not heard.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I do not think I can make this order, the effect of which may be, to make the Plaintiff pay the costs of the Defendant's contempt. I doubt whether the seventeenth rule of the Act gives authority to the Court: it provides only for "any other case of a commitment for contempt not herein specially provided for;" and the Act contains this very humane provision, that the prison shall be [55] visited by an officer of the Court, upon whose report the Court may make provision for payment of the costs of a party in contempt, not in the way which is here asked, but out of the Suitors' Fund.

[55] IRELAND v. EADE. Jan. 12, 1844.

A receiver ought not to present a petition, or originate proceedings, in the cause; any necessary application ought to be made by the parties to the suit. There are exceptions to the rule; as where a receiver had incurred costs in the execution of his duties, which the parties had long neglected to provide for, it was held that he was justified in presenting a petition for their payment.

This was a petition of the receiver in the cause, for payment of certain costs, charges and expences which he had incurred.

It appeared that in 1832 Mr. Smallpiece the Petitioner had been appointed receiver, and that he had incurred considerable expences in obtaining possession of the property, in consequence of the violence of one of the Defendants. It was also admitted that he had incurred other costs, charges, and expences in the performance of his duties of receiver, which had not been paid. He had, in 1834 and afterwards, made various applications to the solicitors of the parties, requesting them to obtain an order for the taxation, and some orders had been made to that effect, which, however, had failed, upon technical objection afterwards taken thereto.

In 1839 Mr. Davison had obtained the conduct of the cause, and he promised to make an application to the Court respecting the Petitioner's claim; in 1841 the receiver had been discharged. No further steps having been taken to satisfy the receiver's claim, he presented a petition for the taxation and payment of his costs, charges, and expences.

[56] Mr. G. Turner and Mr. Prescott White, in support of the petition.

Mr. Kindersley, contra, contended that the receiver ought not to have presented this petition, and that it had been done without any proper communication with the other parties; he urged that the receiver ought to pay the costs of it.

Mr. Stinton, for the Plaintiff.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. A receiver ought not to present a petition or originate any proceedings in a cause; any necessary application should be made by the parties to the suit. That is the general rule; but there is some difficulty in adhering to it, and many exceptions to it have been allowed. Sir John Leach, however, did adhere to it with considerable strictness.

In this case the Petitioner was appointed receiver twelve years ago, and all acknowledge that he incurred costs, charges and expences in the execution of his duty, which he is entitled to receive. He does not seem to have been desirous of presenting a petition of his own, and he carefully and properly applied to the parties to the suit, in order that they might take proceedings for the satisfaction of his claim. I do not find that they were unwilling to do so; but unfortunately they set about it in such a way as to produce no result to the receiver. An order was even obtained, but without due service, and it could not be acted on. This was not the fault of Mr. Davison, who had not the conduct of the cause till 1839. Though he knew of these costs, charges and expences, and seems to have intended to [57] provide for them, yet nothing effectual was ever done. The receiver being entitled to costs, charges and expences, and the parties having delayed for ten years to provide for their taxation and payment, I think he was justified in presenting this petition. The order must be made, and I cannot charge him with the costs of the proceedings. The costs of all parties must be paid out of the fund in the hands of the receiver.

[57] ROBERTS v. JONES. Jan. 21, 1844.

A Plaintiff neglected to set down a plea for argument. The Defendant moved, ex parte, for the costs of the plea and of suit. The Court declined to make the order.

In this case, the Defendant had filed a plea; the Plaintiff neglected to set it down for argument within the three weeks, according to the exigency of the 35th Order of the 26th of August 1841 (Ord. Can. 175), in consequence of which, it was "to be held good to the same extent, and for the same purposes as a plea allowed upon argument."

Mr. Simons now moved, ex parte, that the Plaintiff might pay the costs of the plea and suit. He observed that this was like the case of a demurrer submitted to under similar circumstances; Cartwright v. Smith (6 Beav. 121), Mackenzie v. Claridge (6 Beav. 123); and he referred to the 31st Order of the 3d of April 1828 (Ord. Can. 17), which directs, that on the allowance of a plea to the whole suit, the Plaintiff shall pay the taxed costs of the plea and suit, unless the Plaintiff undertakes to reply, or the Court shall think fit to make other order.

[58] THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. The Plaintiff ought to have notice of this motion, and have an opportunity of undertaking to reply. The case is not like that of a demurrer; for, notwithstanding the plea is to be held good, still the Plaintiff has a right to reply thereto, and to go into evidence to disprove the allegations it contains.

[58] RICHARDSON v. HASTINGS. Jan. 21, 1844.

Liberty given ex parte to amend a clerical error in a demurrer, the twelve days for demurring not having expired.

Mr. Hubback moved ex parte for leave to amend a demurrer, by inserting the words "this Defendant" for "these Defendants."

The twelve days for demurring had not expired. (Ord. Can. 46.)

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS gave liberty to make the amendment, the Defendant undertaking to amend the Plaintiffs' office copy.

[59] UPJOHN v. UPJOHN. Nov. 7, Dec. 22, 1843.

A testatrix, having the moiety of an estate, directed her executors to purchase the other moiety; and "if the purchase should be completed within twelve months after her death," she gave the entirety on certain trusts; "but in case her executors should not be able," within that time, "to purchase it," she directed her moiety to be sold, and the produce, together with £1100 to be held on other trusts. The will contained a gift of the residue of her estate of whatever kind, &c. The purchase "was not completed" within the time, although the executors "were able," so that neither of the expressed events happened. Held, first, that the trusts both of the estate and £1100 failed; and, secondly, that as between the devisees and heir at law, the latter was entitled to the testatrix's moiety of the estate. As to the liability of the executors in this case, quære.

This case appears fully stated in the judgment. It was argued by Mr. Pemberton Leigh and Mr. Prescott White, for the Plaintiff, and by Mr. Sidebottom, Mr. Heathfield, Mr. Glasse, Mr. Purvis, Mr. Bagshawe, M. C. J. Hall, Mr. Blunt, Mr. Kindersley, and Mr. Turner, for the several Defendants.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh, in reply.

The cases cited were on points not the subject of the reported decision.

Dec. 22. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The questions in this cause arise upon the construction of the will of Ann Tookie, dated the 18th of October 1796.

Some time before the date of the will, an undivided moiety of the estate in question had become vested in the testatrix, by descent from her cousin Ann Burgis. Anthony Burlton Bennett was the owner of the other [60] moiety, and the testatrix, contemplating that her executors might be able to purchase Mr. Bennett's moiety, or might not be able to do so in twelve months, by her will, made dispositions adapted to either event. If Mr. Bennett were disposed to sell his moiety, she directed her executors to purchase it; and if the purchase should be completed within twelve months after her death, she also gave her own moiety to trustees, in trust, during the life of her daughter Catherine Mary Page, to pay the rents to her; and after her death she gave the same moiety to her grandson William George Page and the heirs of his body; and in default of such issue, to her grandson James Clement Page and the heirs of his body; and in default of such issue, to her granddaughter Catherine Anne Page and the heirs of her body; and in default of such issue, to the heirs of the body of her daughter Catherine Mary Page; and in default of such issue to her nephew William Burlton in fee. And if the executors should purchase Mr. Bennett's moiety, she directed the same to be secured and settled, in the manner she had devised the moiety of which she was then possessed, so that the whole might go and descend together.

This was the disposition she made, in contemplation of her trustees and executors completing the purchase of Mr. Bennett's moiety within twelve months after her death. She then proceeded to provide for the other event, and expressed herself as follows: "But in case my said executors shall not be able, within twelve months after my decease, to purchase, on fair and equitable terms, the other moiety of the said estate, then my will and mind is, that they do sell the undivided moiety that I now possess, for the most money that they can procure for the same, and place the money arising from such sale on mortgage security, or vest it in the public [61] funds; and also that they raise £1100 out of my personal estate, and place it on the like security." And she then gave the interest of the sums to be thus invested, to her daughter for life, as she had given to her the rents of the whole estate, if Mr. Bennett's moiety had been purchased; and after the death of her daughter, she gave the purchase-money and the £1100 to her grandson William George Page, if then living, and he should then have attained the age of twenty-one years; but if he died under that age, she gave the principal sum to his brother James Clement Page; and if he also should die under age to his sister Catherine Anne Page, on her attaining twenty-one years of age or day of marriage; and if she died under age and unmarried, then she gave the same sums to any other children her daughter might have, to be divided between them equally, or if her daughter died without children or none of those she left should attain twenty-one years, she gave the same principal sum to her nephew William Burlton. And she gave to her executors all the residue of her estate, of what kind or nature soever, in trust, nevertheless, that they should place the same on mortgage securities, or vest the same in Government security, and pay the interest therefrom arising to her daughter Catherine Mary Page, for her separate use for life, with power for the executors, with her consent, to employ any part of the residue towards the support, education, and advancement in life of her grandson William George Page; and after the death of her daughter, she gave the residue to all the children of her daughter, to be equally divided between them, share and share alike, with survivorship, if any should die under twenty-one years of age; and if none should attain that age, she gave the residue to William Burlton.

By the decree made on the hearing of the cause, inquiries were directed, for the purpose of ascertaining, [62] whether all the persons who were interested in the estate were parties to the cause; and the Master was directed (in case he should find that all parties interested were parties to the suit) to inquire, amongst other things, whether the executors of Ann Tookie were able, within twelve calendar months after her decease, to purchase, on fair and equitable terms, the moiety of the estate in question which did not belong to her; and in answer to this inquiry the Master has reported, that a negotiation was entered into, immediately after the decease of the testatrix, for the purchase of the moiety of the estate which belonged to Mr. Anthony Burlton Bennett, who expressed his willingness to sell the same to the trustees, long before the expiration of the time named by her for the completion of the purchase; and it was understood, by the parties interested under the will and by Mr. Bennett, that the purchase would be completed within twelve calendar months after the decease of the testatrix; and the testatrix's daughter, in expectation that it would be completed, entered into possession of the entirety of the estate, soon after the death of the testatrix, but, in fact, the purchase never was completed, and Mr. Bennett having died intestate as to his moiety, his heir asserted his claim thereto, and sold and conveyed it to Mr. Upjohn; and, under these circumstances, the Master found, that the executors of the testatrix were able, within twelve calendar months after her death, to purchase, on fair and equitable terms, the moiety of the estate which did not belong to her.

We have, therefore, this state of things; the executors might, according to the directions of the will, and therefore ought to have completed the purchase within twelve calendar months after her death, but they neglected to do so, and, in fact, the purchase never was completed. In the event of the purchase of Bennett's [63] moiety being completed in twelve months, the testatrix limited the entirety of the estate in a particular manner. In the event of the executors not being able within twelve months to purchase Bennett's moiety, she directed her own moiety to be sold, and the purchase-money, together with £1100, to be raised out of her personal estate, to be limited in another particular manner.

Inasmuch as the purchase of Bennett's moiety was not completed in twelve calendar months after the testatrix's death, it is said, that the limitation of the entirety of the estate fails. And inasmuch as the executors were able to complete the purchase within the time, it is said, that the limitation of the purchase-money and of £1100, directed in the event of their being unable to complete, fails. And both these limitations failing, it is contended, that the testatrix's moiety of the estate in question passes by the residuary clause in the will.

The apparent object of the testatrix was, to limit and settle this particular estate, if the entirety could be obtained, for the purposes of her trust; she did not intend to limit any other real estate, or her own moiety of this estate, if the other moiety could not be obtained. On the contrary, her intention was to limit money only, if the other moiety of the estate could not be obtained; and for that purpose she desired to have her own moiety sold. The executors, as it would seem, by mere neglect, did not complete the purchase, and the moiety which might and ought to have been purchased according to the trusts of the will, has now vested in a person who is under no obligation to sell. Not only was the purchase not completed in the time limited by the testatrix, but there is no reason to suppose, and it is not alleged, that it can now be completed at all. The intention to limit this [64] particular estate is wholly defeated, and, as the testatrix did not intend to limit any other real estate, or her own moiety of this particular estate, separately, I think that, under the circumstances, no effect can now be given to this devise.

Again, the testatrix did not, in the event which happened (the executors being able to purchase the other moiety), intend to have her moiety sold, in order that the purchase-money, together with £1100, might be limited in the way she directed. Her apparent object was this:—The sale and the limitation of the money were to take effect, only in the event of the executors being unable to purchase Bennett's moiety in twelve months, which they were not; and I do not think, that the default of the executors in not purchasing, can be allowed, contrary to the intention of the testatrix, to give effect to a limitation intended to take effect under different circumstances.

It appears to me that the testatrix intended, at all events, to give a life interest to her daughter, and a certain succession of interests to the grandchildren named in her will; but it cannot be understood, for what reason she varied the limitations to grandchildren, so as to alter the interests, in the different events which she contemplated.

It may be conjectured that she would have made no difference, between the event of the executors being able and neglecting to make the purchase in twelve months, and the event of their being unable to make the purchase in that time; but this would be no more than conjecture. The will affords no clue for the discovery of what her intention might have been, in the event which occurred; and the context of the will does [65] not assist in the construction of the particular clauses. In such circumstances, it appears to me that the safest course is to adhere to the strict words of the clauses. That which was the primary object of the testatrix was defeated by the neglect of the executors. That which was her object only in the event of the first being unattainable, can only have effect given to it, by allowing the neglect of the executors to defeat the first, for the purpose of making the second available, in circumstances different from those which were contemplated by the testatrix.

Whether the executors, or those who represent them, can, in any way, be made answerable for the consequences of their neglect, does not appear to be a question in this cause; but it appears to me, that, under the circumstances, both the directions fail: that the £1100 is not to be raised, but remains part of the residuary personal estate. The remaining question is, whether the testatrix's moiety of the real estate in question passes by the residuary devise in the will, and I think that it does not, for although the words in which the residuary clause is expressed are large enough to comprise real estate, yet the testatrix having clearly intended to dispose of this particular estate in a different manner, it is plain that she did not intend it to pass as residue, and it appears to me that the heir at law became entitled to it.(1)

It must, therefore, be declared, that the sum of £1100 is not to be raised out of the personal estate, and that, under the circumstances, the heir at law of the testatrix is entitled to her moiety of the real estate in question.

[66] LINGREN v. LINGREN. DICK v. LACY. Jan. 25, 1844.

On an application, by motion, for the appointment without a commission of a guardian ad litem to an infant abroad, an affidavit should be produced of the infancy of the party.

Mr. G. Russell in the former case, and Mr. Beavan in the latter, moved for the appointment of a guardian ad litem to an infant resident abroad, without a commission. (See Smith v. Palmer, 3 Beav. 10.)

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale], in both instances, said, that after the recent case which had come before him (Green v. Baddeley, 13 Feb. 1844), in which a guardian had been assigned to a Defendant, who was represented to be an infant, but turned out to have been thirty years of age, he must, on applications of this kind, require an affidavit, that the party was an infant at the time of making the application.

[66] FIELD v. ROBINSON. Jan. 25, 1844.

Where the Defendant submits to pay the whole demand of the Plaintiff, the Court stays the proceedings; but if there be a question in dispute as to the Plaintiff's right to recover certain expenses, and the Defendant does not submit thereto, the Court will not interfere summarily and stop the suit.

A Defendant submitted to the claim of the Plaintiff except the costs of a distringas. The Court would not stay the proceedings till the question was agreed upon or determined.

(1) See Goodright v. Opie, 8 Mod. 123, Wright v. Horne, Fort. 182, and 8 Mod. 222; Roe v. Fludd, Fort. 184; Doe dem. Wells v. Scott, 3 Mau. & S. 300, and 1 Vict. c. 26, s. xxv.

Mr. Turner moved to stay all proceedings in the cause, on payment of the legacy claimed and the costs of suit. Pemberton v. Topham (1 Beav. 316).

[67] Mr. Kindersley, for the Plaintiff, opposed the application, unless the Defendant also paid the costs of a distringas, which the Plaintiff, for his protection, had placed on the fund.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. Where all that the Plaintiff can recover is a certain sum of money and the costs of the suit, and the Defendant comes and offers to pay the whole demand, it is the usual practice of the Court to prevent the suit going on; but if there is a question whether the Plaintiff has or not a right to recover certain expenses incurred by him, and that is in dispute between the parties, and not submitted to by the Defendant, it must be in some way determined (see Vin Sandau v. Moore, 1 Russ. p. 469) before the Court can interfere summarily and stop the suit. (The parties afterwards agreed on a sum to be paid in full.)

[67] NICHOLSON v. NORTON. Jan. 25, 1844.

By the decree sums due from a legatee were ordered to be set off against her share of the testator's estate, and her costs were ordered to be paid to her solicitor. It being found that the claims against her exceeded her portion of the estate, and the legatee being insolvent, an application was made by motion, that the costs ordered to be paid to her solicitor might be carried to the credit of her account. The Court stayed the payment of the costs for a month, in order that the matter might be set right.

The Defendant Elizabeth Elisha was entitled to a share of the estate of the testator in the cause, in respect of which, advances had been made to her by the executor Norton to the amount of £317. She was [68] also indebted to the estate of the testator in the sum of £102.

By the decree, the Defendant Norton was directed to retain those sums out of her share, and her costs were ordered to be paid to her solicitor.

Mr. Wickens, on behalf of Norton, now moved to vary the decree as to the payment of the costs to the solicitor, and that the amount might be carried to the credit of Elizabeth Elisha in taking the accounts. He grounded the application on this, that the share of Elizabeth Elisha in the estate amounted to £250 only, a sum quite insufficient to discharge what was due from her, and that she was insolvent. He argued that a party indebted to the estate will not be allowed to receive any payment while his debt continues unsatisfied; but the costs due to him will be set off pro tanto against the debt due from him; Harmer v. Harris (1 Russ. 155); and that this might be done independently of the solicitor's lien, and by motion after decree; Shine v. Gough (2 Ball & B. 33. And see Cattell v. Simons, 6 Beav. 308).

Mr. Teed, contra. The practice of the Court is not to vary the decree on motion, which can only be done on a rehearing. The state of the accounts is not proved.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I think there is a fair question to be determined. I will therefore stay the payment of the costs for a month, and give an opportunity to apply to set the matter right.

[For previous proceedings, see 6 Beav. 521; 49 E. R. 927; 1 Ph. 476; 41 E. R. 713.]

A prudent solicitor never takes an order for time to answer, on the condition of a serjeant-at-arms, in the terms of the 21st Order of December 1833.

Proceedings on a cross-cause were stayed, till the Defendant in the original cause had fully answered. The answer in the original cause was found sufficient, but some documents, though ordered, had not been produced, their production being the subject of a pending appeal. The Court, overruling the decision of the Master, gave the Defendant in the cross-cause an unconditional order for time to answer, with liberty to apply to extend it.

This was an application by the Defendant in the second suit, for a month's time to answer after the production of the documents mentioned in the answer of the Defendant to the first suit.

On the 5th of July 1842 the original bill was filed, to which the Defendant put in an insufficient answer.

On the 29th of March 1843 the second bill, in the nature of a cross-bill, was filed; and the Defendant in the first suit having filed a second answer on the 15th of July 1843, the Master of the Rolls, on the 27th of July 1843, ordered the production of the documents in the first suit (6 Beavan, 521); and the proceedings in the second suit were stayed, until the Defendant in the first suit had fully answered. The Defendant in the first suit appealed to the Lord Chancellor, as regarded the order for production of certain documents which he considered privileged. (6 Beav. 525, n.)

The answer of the Defendant in the first suit was not found sufficient till the 12th of December 1843; and an application being made to the Master, by the Defendant in the cross-suit, for time to answer, the Master, on the 7th of January 1844, refused to grant it, except on the terms of the 21st Order of December 1833 (Ord. Can. 50), viz., of the [70] Defendant consenting to a serjeant-at-arms, which the Defendant Holmes declined to take; whereupon he applied to the Court.

The appeal had not been disposed of, and the documents, the subject of it, had not been produced. It appeared also, that on the 11th of January instant, an order had been made, in the first cause, for the production of further documents mentioned in the further answer of the Defendant Baddeley, and that it had not yet been complied with.

The present application was supported by an affidavit of the clerk of the solicitor, stating that counsel had advised that before Holmes answered the second bill, the first bill ought to be amended, which ought not to be done till the documents had been produced; and that the deponent believed that counsel could not settle the answer of Holmes, until a month after the documents should have been left for inspection, without great injury to the case of Holmes.

Mr. Turner and Mr. Bird, in support of the motion.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. G. L. Russell, contra.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The answer of the Defendant in the first suit was found sufficient on the 12th of December last; but all the documents have not yet been produced, so that though, in one sense, the answer is sufficient, yet, in another sense, it is still insufficient.

The answer having been found sufficient, the Defendant applied to the Master for time to answer the cross-[71]-bill. He was of opinion that time ought to be granted, but on the condition of the Defendant consenting to a serjeant-at-arms. In my long experience, I never knew this condition submitted to by any prudent solicitor.

Holmes, having had an inspection of some, but not of all, of the documents which have been ordered to be produced, now asks for further time to answer, and I think he is entitled to it.

If he had stated that he was unable to answer until the documents which are the subject of the appeal had been produced, I should have suspended his obligation to answer until they had been produced. The affidavit however states that he requires these documents for the purpose of amending his bill. I cannot attend to that; it can have no weight on this occasion; but then it goes on to say, that the solicitor believes that the answer cannot be settled until a month after the documents have been inspected. This statement is sufficient, and it seems right to grant him five weeks' time, with liberty to apply to extend it, on affidavit shewing that an inspection of these documents is material and necessary before the Defendant can put in his answer to the cross-bill.

[72] ALLEN v. THORP. Nov. 8, 1843.

The ultimate trust in a marriage settlement of a fund belonging to the wife, was to her executors or administrators. Held, first, that the surviving husband, who was her administrator, and not her next of kin, was entitled; and, secondly, that if by those words her next of kin were intended, then that the next of kin at the death of the wife, and not of the husband (who was tenant for life), were entitled.

By a marriage settlement, a fund belonging to the wife was settled on the husband and wife for their respective lives, with remainder to the children of the marriage, to be vested at twenty-one or marriage; and in case no children should attain vested interests (which happened), then as the wife should appoint; and in default unto the executors or administrators of the wife. The wife predeceased the husband, and made no appointment. There was one child only of the marriage, who survived her mother, but died without attaining a vested interest. Held, that the ultimate limitation was in favour of the wife's administrator, and not of her next of kin, and one of two trustees having declined to transfer the fund to the surviving husband, who was his wife's administrator, and having severed in his defence in a suit to obtain a transfer, was allowed no costs.

By the settlement made on the marriage of Mundeford Allen with Elizabeth Rush, a sum of £3000 was settled on the wife and husband for life, in succession, with remainder to the children of the marriage, as the husband and wife or the survivor should appoint, and, for want of such appointment, to the children of the marriage, to be vested at twenty-one or on marriage with consent; and in case no child should attain that age or marry with consent (which happened), then to transfer to such person as the wife should appoint, and in default "unto the executors or administrators of the said Elizabeth Rush."

No appointment was ever made. The wife died in 1827, and a daughter, the only issue of the marriage, died under twenty-one, without having been married. The surviving husband took out administration to his wife and daughter, and applied to Thorp and Griffin, the trustees, to have the fund transferred. Griffin was willing to comply, but Thorp refused.

The husband filed a bill against the trustees, praying a transfer of the trust fund.

[73] The next of kin of the wife were not parties to the suit.

The trustees severed in their defence; Griffin submitted to transfer; but Thorp, by his answer, stated, "that he had been advised by counsel, that it was very doubtful, whether the limitation in the settlement (in default of the appointments therein mentioned), to the executors or administrators of the said Elizabeth Allen (formerly Elizabeth Rush), operated in favour of the said Mundeford Allen, as her husband and administrator, or in favour of the next of kin of the said Elizabeth Rush (afterwards Elizabeth Allen); and that it was also doubtful, whether the words of limitation, used in the said settlement, denoted next of kin living at the decease of the said Elizabeth Allen (in which case they would apply to Elizabeth Frances Allen, the daughter of the said Elizabeth Allen, who died an infant shortly after the decease of the said Elizabeth Allen), or whether they designated next of kin of the said Elizabeth Allen who should be living when the preceding trust failed," in which case certain persons, whom he named, would be her next of kin.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh and Mr. Rogers, for the Plaintiff. The husband, as administrator of his wife, is entitled under the ultimate limitation to her executors or administrators. That point was clearly settled by Lord Cottenham in Daniel v. Dudley (1 Phillips, 1).

Supposing, however, that this is not the proper construction, and that the words "executors or administrators" mean next of kin, then the next of kin of the wife living at her death are alone entitled. Her [74] daughter was sole next of kin at that period; and the Plaintiff, in the character of administrator of his daughter, is entitled to the fund.

The Defendant Thorp, who has unnecessarily occasioned the litigation, in a case in which the Plaintiff is entitled in either alternative, ought to bear the costs.

Mr. G. Turner and Mr. Younge, for Thorp. Though there is a strong expression of Lord Cottenham's opinion in Daniel v. Dudley, still there was no ultimate decision in that case; and the opinions of Lord Brougham in Bulmer v. Jay (3 Myl. & K. 197) and of Sir L. Shadwell in Bulmer and Jay and Daniel v. Dudley are opposed to what fell from Lord Cottenham in the case of Daniel v. Dudley.

Secondly, if the next of kin are entitled; they must be ascertained at the death of the tenant for life, and therefore the representative of the daughter is not entitled. Briden v. Hewlett (2 Myl. & K. 90. And see Bird v. Wood, 2 Sim. & S. 400, and Miller v. Eaton, Cooper, 272).

The Defendant, who has acted bonâ fide, under the opinion of counsel, in a case in which the highest authorities differ, ought to be allowed his costs.

Mr. Walpole, for Griffin, the other trustees.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh, in reply. Lord Brougham, in Bulmer v. Jay (3 Myl. & K. 204), held the fund liable to the wife's debts: this makes that case consistent with Daniel v. Dudley. Briden v. Hewlett turned on the peculiar expression "would," which was held to "import that [75] the testator intended his next of kin at the death of his mother." (See Urquhart v. Urquhart, V.-C. E., 20th of February 1844.) The case of Daniel v. Dudley was brought to the consideration of the Defendant Thorp prior to the institution of the suit. He refused to act on it.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The first question in this case is, whether I am to hold that the words "executors or administrators" mean the next of kin; and I consider that question concluded by authority. The case of Daniel v. Dudley is entirely in point; and I could not consistently come to a different conclusion. But if that question were otherwise decided, and the limitation to the "executors or administrators" of the wife were taken to be a limitation to her next of kin, then the daughter who was next of kin of the lady living at the time of her death would be entitled, and she is represented by the Plaintiff. It seems therefore perfectly clear, in one way or the other, that the Plaintiff must be entitled.

It is matter of argument, in almost every case of this kind, whether you are to intend by the next of kin those who are really so at the time of the death of the party whose next of kin are to take, or whether you can collect from the instrument that there was an intention or reason to exclude them, and give the property to somebody else; but I think that in this case there is no sufficient foundation for the argument, and therefore, in whichever way you may view it, if you look at it as depending upon the authority of the case of Daniel v. Dudley, or upon the construction of the words, as a [76] limitation to the next of kin, in either case, it seems to me, the Plaintiff is entitled.

With respect to costs, the Court, I think, ought to have great regard to the difficult situation in which trustees are almost necessarily placed, in consequence of the various decisions which almost unavoidably arise in this Court, upon the construction of deeds and wills. I feel that this particular Defendant, having, as far as anything appears, fairly laid the case before counsel, and taken his advice and opinion upon it, is entitled to consideration in that respect, and would be entitled to his costs, if there were not other circumstances to countervail that particular circumstance. Now, taking the fact to have been, as it is alleged, that previous to the suit being instituted, this particular decision was pointed out to the Defendant, or to those who were advising him, and in which the point was clearly taken into consideration and decided, and that there is to be set against it only one case, in which the Judge who ultimately decided it, added a clause, the effect of which was to make it, in substance, in conformity with the case of Daniel v. Dudley, namely the clause, that the property was liable to the debts of the wife, I think in the result of this case I ought not to charge this trustee with costs, but that I ought not to give him any.

[77] ROBEY v. WHITEWOOD. Dec. 5, 1843.

A Defendant in custody for want of answer, not having been brought to the Bar of the Court within the limited period, was discharged. Held, that the Plaintiff might, by special order, proceed by a second attachment to enforce an answer.

By the 1 W. 4, c. 36, s. 15, rule 5, where a Defendant is in custody for not answering, and the Plaintiff shall not bring him to the Bar within the period there specified, "the sheriff, gaoler, &c., shall thereupon discharge him out of custody."

The Defendant in this case was taken under an attachment for not answering, and, not having been brought to the Bar within the proper time, was discharged. The Court, subsequently, on the 22d of June, directed, that, unless he answered within a fortnight, a new attachment should issue against him. (5 Beavan, 399.)

The Defendant having been served with the order then made, neglected to put in his answer, whereupon a second attachment issued against him. He was taken under this attachment on the 2d of November 1843, and was turned over to the Queen's Prison on the 4th of November.

A motion was now made to set aside the order of the 22d of June, the second attachment, and the subsequent proceedings, and that the Defendant might be discharged out of custody.

Mr. Teed, in support of the motion. The order of the 22d of June was irregular, the object of the statute was to compel the Plaintiff to use proper diligence, and, [78] to attain that object, it directs, that, in default of the Plaintiff proceeding in the manner therein pointed out, the Defendant, after a certain time, shall be released from custody; Greening v. Greening (1 Beavan, 121). This would be perfectly illusory, and the Defendant would be deprived of the benefit intended for him by the statute, if, being discharged, he might be brought back to prison a second time for the same cause. The fifth rule is imperative that he shall be discharged, and the Court has no discretion to remand him. If it had been intended to vest any discretion in the Court, the Act would have provided for it, as in the thirteenth rule.

At law, where a party has been arrested and discharged, he cannot be taken again for the same cause. The execution operates as a satisfaction. (See Blackburn v. Stupart, 2 East, 243; Clarke v. Clement, 6 T. R. 525; Tanner v. Hague, 7 T. R. 420.) So, here, the discharge from custody is a discharge from the contempt. By force of the statute, the neglect of the Plaintiff has also operated as a waiver or discharge of the contempt, for which it would be unjust to punish an individual a second time.

In Williams v. Townshend (6 Sim. 296) a Defendant having been discharged, as in the present case, Mr. Spence, for the Plaintiff, then moved for liberty to issue a fresh subpoena against the Defendant. But the Vice-Chancellor doubting, whether, if a fresh subpoena were issued, an attachment could be taken out upon it, desired a certificate to be obtained from the clerks in Court upon the point. The certificate was as follows:—"The clerks in Court are of opinion, that, although a new sub-[79]-pens may be issued, yet, as the former attachment was regularly enforced, a new attachment cannot be issued; and as the Defendant has not appeared to the bill, it may be dismissed against that Defendant without costs, and a supplemental bill in the nature of an original bill filed against her." It appears, from the report, that Mr. Spence accordingly moved to dismiss the bill, which was ordered.

Mr. Shebbeare, contra, was not called on by

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale], who said, I cannot grant this application. The construction of this Act of Parliament is certainly very perplexing; and it is quite right that the subject of this motion should again be brought under my consideration. The Defendant appeared, and was afterwards taken into custody on an attachment for want of answer; and the Plaintiff having neglected to cause him to be brought to the Bar of the Court within the time limited by the Act, he was discharged from custody. Now comes the question what is to be done under the Act of Parliament. The Act states, that in case he shall not be brought up within the time limited, he is to be discharged without being required to pay any costs. The Act does not say he is to be discharged from the contempt, or that the Plaintiff is not to be entitled to take any further steps in the cause: the question therefore is, whether the Court is to hold that the Plaintiff is deprived of his right to prosecute the suit, because the Act has discharged the Defendant without payment of costs.

The Plaintiff is not to be deprived of his rights by conjecture or inference; and I think that if the Act meant it, it would have stated that the Defendant, after his discharge, should not be further sued. What then is [80] this Court to do? The Defendant having been discharged, the officer of the Court knew that he was not to issue a new writ of attachment without the order of the Court, and having refused it, the matter was brought before me. The Plaintiff said the Defendant has been discharged; my bill is still on the file, and my suit depending; am I to be deprived of the right of prosecuting my suit? The Act of Parliament does not say so, and I am entitled to all that the Act has not taken from me.

I considered, on the former occasion, what was proper to be done; the course being doubtful, I did not act without consulting the officers of the Court, and, after consideration, I made the order complained of. The Defendant was served with notice of that order, and had the opportunity of putting in his answer, which he has not done.

This application must be refused, but without costs. It was not improper to bring the matter again to my attention.

Admitting that this proceeding is new, it is founded on this, that a man's rights are not to be taken away by inference, which would be the case if the Plaintiff were prevented going on with his suit.

[81] EVANS v. DAVIES. DAVIES v. EVANS. Nov. 17, 1843.

[Followed, In re Heiron's Estate, 1879, 12 Ch. D. 795.]

Mode of enforcing the sheriff's return to a writ of fi. fa. issuing out of Chancery.

By the decree, David Evans was ordered to pay a sum of £100, 14s. 6d. A writ of feri facias issued to compel payment with interest (Ordines Can. 142), which was forwarded to the Under-Sheriff of Cardigan for execution. The amount was levied on the 12th of October 1843.

On the 24th of October the usual ex parte order was made, upon petition of course at the Rolls, that the sheriff should return the writ forthwith.

This not having been obeyed, it was now moved that the sheriff should return the writ in six days after notice, or stand committed.

The proceedings by fi. fa. being new, the only question was as to the proper form of order now to be made.

Mr. Goodeve, in support of the motion, cited Smith's Pr. (1 Smith's Pr. 217 (3d edit.), and two MSS. cases of Snell v. Waring (Reg. Lib. 1767, A. fo. 293) and Wyatt v. Austin (13th of May 1825), furnished by Mr. Walker the registrar. (And see Wy. Pr. Reg. 51; Clough v. Cross, 2 Dickens, 555, 1 Newland's Pr. 92, and 1 Daniel's Pr. 590.)

[82] From the affidavits it appeared that the sheriff had been repeatedly urged to make the return.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS ordered that the sheriff should, within six days after notice of the order, return the writ, or stand committed, and that he should pay the costs of the two applications.

The London agents of the under-sheriff were alone served with the order of the 24th of October; and in drawing up the present order, a question arose, whether that was sufficient (see the 3 & 4 W. 4, c. 42, s. 20), but the matter was arranged between the parties.

[82] REYNELL v. REYNELL. Dec. 13, 1843.

An order of the Master, giving the Defendant three weeks to answer after the Plaintiff had amended his bill, which was defective for want of parties, discharged as irregular.

This bill was filed on the 21st of July 1843. On the 6th of November, and before the Defendant had answered, the Plaintiff gave notice to the Defendant, that on the 15th of July 1843 he had conveyed one moiety of the estates mentioned in the bill, "to Charles Wilson, his heirs and assigns, to uses, for the benefit of R. S. M. Sprye and Henrietta D. his wife."

The Defendant's solicitor thereupon wrote to the Plaintiff's solicitor, to know if he intended to obtain an order to amend, by adding those persons parties, and in reply was informed, on the 10th of November, "that no amendment would be made until after the Defendant's answer had been put in."

[83] On the 16th of November the Master ordered "that the Defendant should have three weeks' time to plead, answer, or demur to the Plaintiff's bill, not demurring alone, after the Plaintiff should have amended his bill."

Mr. Kindersley now moved to discharge this order, on the ground that it was irregular, and that the Master had no authority to make an order in this form.

Mr. Piggott, contra, contended, that the order was valid, though perhaps unusual, and that it was one which would have the effect of saving considerable expence and delay to the parties.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The Master must have been taken by surprise in this case; I think the order cannot be supported. Let it be discharged without costs, and let the Defendant have three weeks' time to answer.

[83] ELLIS v. GRIFFITHS. Jan. 11, 1844.

In a foreclosure suit, the mortgagee having received rents between the date of the Master's report and the day appointed for payment, the Court, on motion, referred it back to the Master to continue the accounts, and to fix a new day.

A decree was made for foreclosure, and a day was appointed for payment at the Rolls Chapel of £4961, 2s. 9d., the amount by the Master's report found to be due on that day, and in default the Defendant was to be foreclosed.

[84] The mortgagee, being in possession, received half a year's rent, after the date of the report, and before the day appointed for payment. (Garlick v. Jackson, 4 Beavan, 154; and Alden v. Foster, 5 Beavan, 592.) He attended at the Rolls on the day named (14th November 1843), but no person tendered the amount.

The balance having been altered by the receipt of the rent, the mortgagee now came, by motion, to refer it back to the Master to carry on the subsequent account, and to appoint a fresh day to redeem.

Mr. Stinton, in support of the application.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] made the order.

Hessin*, 1903, 20 R. P. C. 429.]

A blacking manufactory had long been carried on under the firm of Day & Martin, at 97 High Holborn. The executors of the survivor continued the business under the same name. A person of the name of Day having obtained the authority of one Martin to use his name, set up the same trade at 90½ Holborn Hill, and sold blacking as of the manufacture of Day & Martin, 90½ Holborn Hill, in bottles and with labels having a general resemblance to those of the original firm. He was restrained by injunction.

Principles on which the Court interferes to prevent the use of trade marks.

This was a motion, on behalf of the executors of Mr. Day, the well-known blacking maker, to restrain the Defendant, his nephew, from selling blacking manufactured by him, in bottles having affixed thereto labels, being copies, or fac-similes or imitations with colourable variations only, of those used by the firm of Day & Martin, or any labels which should repre-[85]-sent, or have the appearance of representing, the said firm of Day & Martin as manufacturers of the composition or blacking described in such labels, and from using trade cards of the same description.

It appeared from the case of the Plaintiffs, that in 1801 Charles Day and Benjamin Martin entered into partnership as blacking manufacturers, for the term of 21 years, and carried on the business at 97 High Holborn. In 1808 Martin transferred his interest to Day, who was to be at liberty to use Martin's name for the remainder of the 21 years. This term was afterwards extended to 25 years, from the year 1820, determinable on the death of Martin, and they agreed (but how did not appear) to be partners for that period.

Martin died in 1834, and Day died in 1836, and the business was carried on in the names of Day & Martin by Day's executors. The Defendant Day, the testator's nephew, had recently set up as a blacking maker at No. 90½ Holborn Hill, and had sold blacking in similar bottles, and with similar labels (with some variations), to those which had heretofore been used by Day & Martin, and to those now used by the executors of Day. The variation was thus described in the affidavit:—"Saith, that the name of the article sold as being real Japan blacking made by Day & Martin, and the description and directions for the use of the said article, and the price, and signature of the names Day & Martin, contained in the labels of the Defendant, are in the same precise words, and (with very trifling and unimportant variations) are in the same character and description of type, as the name of the article to be sold, and the description, and directions for use, and the price, and the signature of the said firm in the label used by the firm of Day & Martin as foresaid; and the only difference in the [86] two labels is, that the Defendant has substituted the Royal arms in the centre of the label, for the representation or drawing of the manufactory of the firm contained on the labels of the firm, and has substituted in the label the figures and words 90½ Holborn Hill, for the figures and words 97 High Holborn, contained in the label of the firm, and has omitted to insert the figures 90½ the names Day & Martin, in the manner in which those words or names are inserted by the firm in their said figures 97."

The Defendant by his affidavit stated, that the carts of the Plaintiffs now bore the names of Charles Day and Richard, and not Benjamin, Martin. That previously to the Defendant's vending or offering for sale any blacking, he applied to an intimate acquaintance of his, of the name of Martin, to join him in the manufacture and sale hereof, and obtained permission to use his name, in conjunction with his own, as manufacturers and vendors of blacking, and that he, the Defendant, was now in treaty, and only waiting the result of this suit, finally to settle the terms of a partnership with Mr. Martin, for carrying on the said business of blacking manufacturers.

Mr. Tinney, Mr. Purvis, and Mr. Toller, in support of the motion, argued, that the Defendant was intentionally practising a fraud upon the Plaintiffs, and a deception on the public; and that whatever might be his right to manufacture and sell blacking in his own name, still he had no right or authority to assume the additional name of Martin, and use labels, &c., whose general character was so similar to that which the Plaintiffs and the testator had long been in the habit of using, as to induce purchasers to believe that the article [87] sold by the Defendant was manufactured by and purchased from the Plaintiffs.

Mr. Turner and Mr. Mylne, contra, contended that the Defendant had an undoubted right to affix his own name to his own manufacture, and that he had authority to add that of Mr. Martin, with whom he was in treaty for a partnership. That there was a marked difference between the labels, and as to those points in which there was a resemblance, they had long been adopted by the trade in general.

That the Plaintiffs had practised a deception on the public, by representing the manufacture to be that of Day & Martin, while no person of those names was concerned therein; that consequently the Plaintiffs came before the Court under circumstances to disentitle them to its assistance.

Knott v. Morgan (2 Keen, 213), Perry v. Truefitt (6 Beavan, 66), were referred to.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] (without hearing a reply). What is proper to be done in cases of this kind must, more or less, depend upon the circumstances which attend them.

There are cases like that of the London Conveyance Company, in which the injunction is granted at once; there are cases like that of the Mexican Balm, in which the injunction is refused until the Plaintiff has established his right at law. In short, in such cases, there must be a great variety of circumstances; and the Court must deal with each case according to the nature of its peculiar circumstances.

[88] The accusation which is made against this Defendant is this:—that he is selling goods, under forms and symbols of such a nature and character, as will induce the public to believe, that he is selling the goods which are manufactured at the manufactory which belonged to the testator in this cause. It has been very correctly said, that the principle, in these cases, is this:—that no man has a right to sell his own goods as the goods of another. You may express the same principle in a different form, and say that no man has a right to dress himself in colours, or adopt and bear symbols, to which he has no peculiar or exclusive right, and thereby personate another person, for the purpose of inducing the public to suppose, either that he is that other person, or that he is connected with and selling the manufacture of such other person, while he is really selling his own. It is perfectly manifest, that to do these things is to commit a fraud, and a very gross fraud. I stated, upon a former occasion, that, in my opinion, the right which any person may have to the protection of this Court, does not depend upon any exclusive right which he may be supposed to have to a particular name, or to a particular form of words. His right is to be protected against fraud, and fraud may be practised against him by means of a name, though the person practising it may have a perfect right to use that name, provided he does not accompany the use of it with such other circumstances as to effect a fraud upon others.

It is perfectly manifest, that two things are required for the accomplishment of a fraud such as is here contemplated. First, there must be such a general resemblance of the forms, words, symbols, and accompaniments as to mislead the public. And secondly, a sufficient distinctive individuality must be preserved, so as to procure for the person himself the benefit of that [89] deception which the general resemblance is calculated to produce. To have a copy of the thing would not do, for though it might mislead the public in one respect, it would lead them back to the place where they were to get the genuine article, an imitation of which is improperly sought to be sold. For the accomplishment of such a fraud it is necessary, in the first instance, to mislead the public, and in the next place, to secure a benefit to the party practising the deception by preserving his own individuality.

There are many distinctions, even more than have been stated, between these two labels. It is truly said, that if anyone takes upon himself to study these two labels he will find several marks of distinction. On the other hand, the colours are of the same nature, the labels are exactly of the same size, the letters are arranged precisely in the same mode, and the very same name appears on the face of the jars or bottles in which the blacking is put. It appears, therefore, to me that there is quite sufficient to mislead the ordinary run of persons, and that the object of the Defendant is, to persuade the public that this new establishment is, in some way or other, connected with the old firm or manufacturer, and at the same time to get purchasers to go to 90½ Holborn Hill, and not to 97 High Holborn. I think what has been done here is quite calculated to effect that purpose, and the Defendant must be restrained.

My decision does not depend on any peculiar or exclusive right the Plaintiffs have to use the names Day & Martin, but upon the fact of the Defendant using them names in connection with certain circumstances, and in a manner calculated to mislead the public, and to enable the Defendant to obtain, at the expense of Day's estate, a benefit for himself, to which he is not, [90] in fair and honest dealing, entitled. Such being my opinion, I must grant the injunction restraining the Defendant from carrying on that deception. He has a right to carry on the business of a blacking manufacturer honestly and fairly; he has a right to the use of his own name; I will not do anything to debar him from the use of that, or any other name calculated to benefit himself in an honest way; but I must prevent him from using it in such a way as to deceive and defraud the public, and obtain for himself, at the expense of the Plaintiffs, an undue and improper advantage.

The form of the injunction was discussed, when

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS, after stating that he was inclined to rely on the terms of the injunction in Knott v. Morgan, as that case had been the subject of appeal, said, he would himself settle the terms of the injunction.

By the terms of the injunction, the Defendant, his servants, &c., were restrained from selling, or exposing for sale, or procuring to be sold, any composition or blacking described as, or purporting to be, blacking manufactured by Day & Martin, in bottles, having affixed thereto such labels as in the Complainants' bill mentioned, or any other labels, so contrived or expressed, as, by colourable imitation or otherwise, to represent the composition or blacking sold by the Defendant, to be the same as the composition or blacking manufactured and sold by John Weston (the manager), for the benefit of the estate of Charles Day the testator; and from using trade cards, so contrived or expressed, as to represent that any composition or blacking sold or proposed to be sold by the Defendant, is the same as the composition or blacking manufactured or sold by John Weston.

Whether a feme covert, who is entitled to a reversionary interest in a chose in action, can, by obtaining a release of the prior interest, effectually dispose of the property, quære.

The testator gave his residuary personal estate to his widow durante viduitate, and on her decease, upon certain trusts, under which Elizabeth, the wife of G. L. Moore, was entitled to a vested interest in one-ninth part, immediately expectant on the decease or marriage of the widow.

The property amounted in the whole to about £1800, and consisted of a mortgage, and of a sum of £312 consols in Court. The parties being desirous of compromising the suit, the widow released unto G. L. Moore and wife her interest in one-ninth of the residuary estate, the object being, to reduce the reversionary interest of Mrs. Moore into one in possession, for the purpose of effecting the compromise.

A petition was now presented, praying a division of the consols in the manner agreed upon, and the question was whether, under these circumstances, the share of Mrs. Moore, a married woman, could be effectually dealt with. (See Purdew v. Jackson, 1 Russ. 1; Honner v. Morton, 3 Russ. 65; Stiffe v. Everitt, 1 Myl. & Cr. 37.)

Mr. Rogers, in support of the petition, argued that the interest was no longer reversionary, and could therefore be effectually disposed of so as to bind the wife, if she survived. He cited the following authorities:—Dorwell v. Earle, 12 Ves. 473; Lewin on Trusts, 296 (2d edit.); Wilson v. Oldham, Ibid. 297; Bean v. [92] Sykes, 2 Hayes on Convey. 640 (5th edit.); Lachton v. Adams, 5 Law J. Rep. (N. S.) Chanc. 382; 6 Jarman's Convey. 236 (1st ed.); Preston v. Smelt, 2 Leg. Ex. 501; Re Silcock's Estate, 3 Russ. 369.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale], after consideration, thought that the principle involved in this case was of too much importance to be decided on petition, and intimated that a bill must be filed to accomplish the wishes of the parties.

[92] BUSTARD v. SAUNDERS. Nov. 9, 1843.

A sum of money was remitted to England, to be secured for the benefit of a married woman and her children, so that the same might not come to the hands of her husband. Held, that they took as joint-tenants.

In this case, Achilles Preston the younger, some time before the year 1764, remitted from India to Achilles Preston the elder, his father, and Alexander Whitchurch his uncle, £500, "which he directed to be secured for the benefit of his sister Ann, then the wife of Cuthbert Allanson, and her children, so that the same might not come to the hands or power of her husband."

Ann Allanson had three children only, all of whom were born previous to the year 1764. Ann Allanson survived all her children, and died in 1812.

The question was, whether the mother took this fund for life, with remainder to her children, or whether they took in a class as joint-tenants.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh and Mr. Willcock, argued that the mother and her children, took as joint-tenants, and therefore that the mother became entitled to the whole by survivorship.

[93] Mr. Faber, for the Defendant. There was a direction to secure the sum in question for the sister and her children, excluding the husband. A settlement was therefore contemplated, and in carrying into effect an executory agreement for a settlement expressed in such terms, the Court would give a life-estate to the parent, with remainder to the children as tenants in common.

The following cases were cited, Jubber v. Jubber (9 Sim. 503), De Witte v. De Witte (11 Sim. 41), Vaughan v. The Marquis of Headfort (10 Sim. 639), Robinson v. Tickell (8 Ves. 142).

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] said, he should follow the decision of De Witte v. De Witte, and he held that the mother and children took the £500 as joint-tenants.

An heir who disputes the will, may, by long acquiescence, lose his right to have its validity tried at law, upon an issue devisavit vel non, and where an heir had acted as devisee in trust under the will for a great number of years, he was refused an issue even to try the question of parcels.

A will thirty years old, produced from the proper custody, proves itself. The thirty years are to be computed from the date of the will, and not from the death of the testator, and are calculated as at the time of its production.

Heir at law being also the devisee in trust, misconducting his defence, ordered to pay all the costs of the suit.

In the year 1802 the testator, George Crawford Ricketts, purchased a mansion and 166 acres of land adjoining thereto, which together were generally called and known as the Ashford Hall estate.

[94] In 1804 the testator, on the marriage of his eldest son, the Defendant Thomas Bourke Ricketts, charged a portion of this estate with a sum of £4000 for the benefit of the Defendant, his wife, and the children of the marriage.

On the 26th of April 1808 the testator made his will, whereby he devised as follows:—"As it is my wish and desire that all my estate in Shropshire, called Ashford Hall, should be sold, I do therefore give and devise the same unto my son Thomas B. Ricketts, and my son-in-law the Rev. R. F. Hallifax," "in trust to sell,"

&c. "The proceeds of such sale, after deducting what may be due on the mortgage given on my eldest son's marriage, I give and bequeath unto my sons and daughters in equal proportions share and share alike."

The testator died in April 1811, leaving the Defendant Thomas B. Ricketts his heir at law; and shortly after in the same month, the will was proved by Thomas B. Ricketts and R. F. Hallifax.

In October 1811 the trustees put up the whole property, including 166 acres, for sale, and in the particulars the whole was treated as vested in devisees in trust for sale; the property, however, was not then sold. In 1812 it was again advertised for sale, in terms which shewed that the whole was included. This second attempt to sell was again unsuccessful. In 1823 they sold a part of the estate to Miss Buckley, and in the correspondence of the Defendant and on the treaty, no doubt was made either as to the name of the estate, or as to what had passed by the devise. The conveyance to Miss Buckley was executed in 1824, and thereby, after reciting the will, &c., the trustees conveyed, and [95] the Defendant Thomas Bourke Ricketts, as heir at law, confirmed, the portion of the property purchased.

From the death of the testator, the Defendant Thomas Bourke Ricketts retained possession of the property unsold. In 1831, one of the testator's children having become bankrupt, his assignees, in December 1836, filed this bill against the trustees of the will and others, to have the trusts of the will performed, for an account of the proceeds of the property sold, and of the rents, and for the sale of the remainder. The will was not proved by the attesting witnesses, but was produced only from the proper custody, it being conceived that, being thirty years old, it proved itself.

Mr. Kindersley, Mr. Turner, and Mr. Hallett, for the Plaintiffs.

Mr. C. P. Cooper, and Mr. Kent, for the Defendant Thomas B. Ricketts, resisted the claim of the Plaintiffs, insisting, first, that the will had not been properly proved in the cause; that if the mere production of an ancient will was sufficient proof, the thirty years must be computed from the death of the party, when it first had any operation, and must end before the filing of the bill, or at all events upon the filing of the answer contesting its validity (1); secondly, that under the devise of the estate called Ashford Hall, the hall or mansion and a few acres of land passed, and not the whole 166 acres; thirdly, that he was not accountable for the intermediate rents, or at all events not for more than six years; and, [96] lastly, that he was entitled to an issue devisee vel non to try the validity of the will, or, at least, to determine the question of parcels.

Mr. Tinney, Mr. Roupell, and Mr. Willcock, for other Defendants.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. In such a case as this, I ought not to ask for a reply. It seems to me too clear a case. The only point on which I had a doubt was, whether under any circumstances the heir at law might not have an issue devisee vel non. Three points have been raised here by way of defence. First, that it is not proved that there was any such will; secondly, supposing there was such a will, that it does not appear that the whole of this estate passed by it; thirdly, if it shall appear there was such a will, and that such an estate passed by it, then that the Defendant is not bound to account for the rents and profits beyond six years.

This case certainly surpasses anything I have met with. The testator had purchased an estate in Shropshire, which was called the estate of Ashford Hall, or Ashford Hall estate, which estate is described in several deeds executed before the date of the will; the testator then makes this will, "As it is my wish and desire," &c.

The will was dated on the 26th of April 1808. The testator died in April 1811, and the will was proved a very short time afterwards. The Defendant Thomas Bourke Ricketts, who was himself entitled to the benefit of a mortgage on the greatest part, though not the whole of the property, accepted the devise, and, with his co-[97]-trustee, took upon himself the execution of the trust. In the same year he advertised the whole for sale, and described the whole as the Ashford Hall estate, or the estate called Ashford Hall, and as consisting of 166 acres of land, being the whole of the land and property which is now in question. A sale was not then effected, and in the following year, he, consistently with the duty which was imposed upon him, together with Mr. Hallifax, again advertized the property for sale, not in the same words, but in words quite sufficiently descriptive to shew that the whole was meant. It is therefore a matter beyond all question, and a purely idle thing to doubt, for a moment, that he and his co-trustee accepted the devise made to them in trust, that they undertook to perform the trust, and at that time fairly, honestly, and in due discharge of their duty endeavoured to perform the trust, by selling the estate, in order that the proceeds might be divided, according to the direction of the will. The second attempt to sell was not more successful than the first. Several years elapsed which have not been accounted for, but there appears to have been a treaty, which ended successfully in the sale of a portion of the estate to Miss Buckley. The Defendant, Mr. Ricketts, took an active part upon that occasion, and we have his correspondence on the treaty; in which there appears to have been not the least doubt or hesitation as to the name of the estate, as to what passed by the devise, or as to the duty of himself and his co-trustee.

(1) See M'Kenire v. Fraser, 9 Ves. 5; Doe dem. Oldham v. Wolley, 8 Barn. & Cr. 22; Holton v. Lloyd, 1 Mol. 30. On the last point see the cases of Tucker v. Sanger, M'Clelland, 424. S. C. 13 Price, 119, and see Earl of Fingal v. Blake, 1 Molloy, 113.

Upon the performance of the contract with Miss Buckley, a conveyance was executed to her, in which the testator's will is recited, and this gentleman and his co-trustee, as trustees, join in conveying. It is clear from this deed, that the particular attention of this gentleman was called, and must have been called, at the [98] time, to his own character as heir at law; for after conveying as trustee, he, in his character of heir, ratifies and confirms what had been previously done by the trustees; yet he now affects to say, in the first place, that there was no such duly executed will, and, in the next place, that a very small portion, and not the whole of these lands, passed by the will. This is by no means all. There continue a series of transactions, further negotiations with this lady, and a correspondence, which further evidences the nature of the case. It certainly is not without considerable surprise that one hears such a defence raised after what has taken place.

Afterwards one of his brothers becomes a bankrupt, and the estate, as to two-sixth parts of it, becomes vested in his assignees, and then in the year 1835 this gentleman, being called upon to give an account of this trust, does not raise the smallest question as to the will, or as to what passed by it, or as to what was his duty as trustee in regard to the sale of the estate. He however sets up a most extraordinary claim; for, admitting that there was this trust for a sale, and that it was to be made for the benefit of himself and his brothers and sisters, he says, "Oh, but there is no devise at all of the rents intermediate between the death of the testator and the sale of the estate. I may keep the estate unsold for forty years, and the persons who are objects of the trust are entitled to no benefit from the rents to accrue in the meantime." That is what he seems to have said in his examination under the bankruptcy.

It is really not worth while to go any further, though there are other things stated, as the account, &c., of the proof of which I am not well satisfied. I have stated, however, far more than enough to make it absolutely [99] incumbent on the Court to say, that there is abundant proof of his continued acting as trustee. It is proved that he has acted as trustee, claimed the right to be devisee of the trust, admitted that he was to perform his trust from the time of the testator's death for the full period of twenty-five years, and it is plain that he has done this with his eyes constantly open, and perfectly well knowing all the circumstances; there is not a pretence to the contrary, except what I shall presently notice.

The assignees of the bankrupt brother filed this bill in December 1836. The evasive and improper conduct of this Defendant, as to the mode of answering the bill, can have no effect on his rights at the hearing; but he did certainly, in the most extraordinary manner, evade answering the bill, for reasons which would bear no consideration at all. However, at length an answer is obtained, and what does he say and put in issue? He admits, in the third answer, that the testator was seized, that he duly made and published his last will, of such date, and to such purport and effect as in the bill mentioned. He admits the testator was of sound mind. Whether it was executed so as to pass freehold estates, he submits to the Court; he raises a question upon that. Then he states that this Ashford Hall estate, which he had admitted over and over again to consist of 166 acres of land, consisted of a messuage, garden, and so on, and ten acres of land. He repeats the same thing over and over again in different parts of the answer, and says afterwards, that, according to his knowledge and belief, the only estate in Shropshire called Ashford Hall which passed by the will, and is thereby directed to be sold, was a capital messuage and appurtenances, together with part only of his other freehold estate.

[100] Does he or not mean to admit that that part passed? I am very much disposed to think, if it were necessary to determine that question, that he did admit that part passed, consequently that there was a good devise, and consequently that he was not entitled to have an issue of devisavit vel non. However, it is ambiguous: the answer is prepared with studied ambiguity, for the very purpose, I presume, of preventing him from committing himself, in the way he might have done, if he had said there was a good devise of this or not a good devise of the other part of the estate. He did not wish to do that, but to express himself in such ambiguous terms as to avoid the consequences which might arise from a distinct statement of the fact.

I was very anxious to ascertain, among other things, what it was that this gentleman supposed he had discovered after this bill had been filed, and when he was called upon to state what passed by the devise, and which discovery caused a total alteration of the opinion, upon which he had, advisedly, acted for not less than twenty-five years. What he says is this, "that he did not know, until he was called upon by the original bill to state what the Ashford Hall estate consisted of, that the testator was seised of anything so called except his mansion-house in Shropshire, or of any real estate which would not have passed under a devise of his mansion-house in Shropshire called Ashford Hall; and the Defendant then discovered, for the first time, that the testator had shrubberies and fish-pools, which had been purchased from an adjoining estate a few years before he purchased the property, and were then so called, as well as the said mansion-house, and would not have passed under a devise of the mere mansion-house only."

[101] I was curious to see how these things were described in these deeds—it was rather important to do so. The deeds convey "all that capital messuage or mansion-house, with the gardens, shrubberies, stables, fish-pools, coach-house, building, and appurtenances thereto belonging, called Ashford Hall." Now he has not attempted to shew by the least distinction that those words do not apply.

The real question is, whether I am to direct an issue upon one point or the other. The Defendant's counsel does not desire that I should take any admission from him, therefore I will consider it as not admitted at all. The will is proved sufficiently for this Court to establish it; it is proved to be thirty years old from the date to the time when it is produced; and sufficient authority has been produced from the decisions at common law that this is enough. Since I came into Court, the registrar has reminded me that I had a case here, on the same subject-matter, some time since, and in which the same point was decided. I apprehend that this is perfectly clear, and that the proof is sufficient. This is, therefore, a case of the will being proved, and the question is, whether it is to be established without an issue devisavit vel non. I quite concur in the opinion that was expressed by Chief Baron Alexander in the case cited. It is the ordinary course to grant an issue at the request of an heir, but it is not a necessary course, when the special circumstances are such as to make it manifestly improper. Now no case has been produced from the books, in which, upon special reasons assigned, the heir at law has been refused such an issue to try his right at law, and I have not met with any such case myself; the case before Chief Baron Alexander was not one, for there it was granted. I am therefore under the necessity of making a precedent in this case. Mr. [102] Ricketts will have the benefit of considering it as a point newly decided, if he thinks fit to do so. I adopt, however, the opinion of Chief Baron Alexander, in which I concur; and the question is, whether the special circumstances of this case are such, as to make it proper to act upon that opinion. I am of opinion they are. What, shall a trustee, taking upon himself a trust in the year 1811, proceeding towards the execution of it, carrying part of it into execution, procuring the payment to himself of the mortgage, which was to be paid in execution of that trust, and proceeding throughout the whole course of this business in the manner he has done in this case, when the will is produced and proved, when he himself does not deny its validity by his answer, be permitted to say, after all this length of time, "Whatever inconvenience may happen to the parties, I have a right to have this matter tried by an issue devisavit vel non!" I am of opinion that he is not so entitled. The special circumstances of this case seem to me to take it out of the general rule, and bring it within the particular rule mentioned by Chief Baron Alexander. I have great doubt whether this gentleman will ever, in any way whatever, be brought to say that he does not believe that the will was duly executed by his father. I believe there are boundaries beyond which he will not go.

The next question is, whether I am to direct an issue to try parcel or no parcel. It would be absurd to do it after what has passed here, after what is contained in these deeds, after the description given by this gentleman himself, after the correspondence produced under his own hand, in which he admits all these things, and upon his statement in his answer, that the only things he has described are the fishponds and the shrubbery, which were acquired a few years before the testator purchased the estate. It would be absurd if I were to do it. This Court is not bound to direct an issue to try a matter of this kind, if it is satisfied upon the evidence before it. I am clearly satisfied the whole of this passed, and I must, therefore, so declare, in the decree I am to make.

The next question is, whether there is to be an account of the rents. Can anybody doubt that a trustee, taking possession of an estate, receiving the rents, applying them to his own use, professing, down to the year 1835, that he intends to execute the trust, professing beyond all doubt or question, therefore, that he holds the possession for the use of the cestui que trust—are we to be told, there has been no demand of it, because they have confided in his professions, that the trust was to be executed by sale, down to the time when this bill was filed in 1836, and that, therefore, they were not to call upon him for any accounts whatever, but that he is to be allowed to apply the rents he has received for his cestui que trust to his own use! Upon none of these points do I feel that I ought to hesitate at all.

Upon the first point, it is very possible this is a new decision, and it is very possible it may deserve consideration elsewhere. I have, however, stated what is my deliberate opinion upon it.

The will must be established. It must be declared that the whole of the testator's land in Shropshire passed by this will. Then there must be an account taken of the rents as prayed for by the bill, except only that the Plaintiff must not have annual rests in the accounts. In taking the accounts care must be taken with respect to the mortgage. This gentleman was entitled to have the interest of the mortgage, therefore, in taking [104] the accounts, he must be allowed up to the time when the mortgage was paid off. There must be an occupation rent set upon this property during the time the Defendant was in the occupation of the property.

Lastly comes the question as to the costs, and I am bound to take into consideration the whole conduct of the Defendant. He must pay the costs of this suit up to this hearing. Reserve the costs of the subsequent proceedings. The costs of the Co-defendants must be paid by the Plaintiffs in the first instance, and they to recover them over against the Defendant.

[104] In re BROUGH. Jan. 16, 19, 1844.

The clerk at the Enrolment Office cannot receive an enrolment conditionally, and the Master of the Rolls refused to cancel or vacate an enrolment of a specification which had been left at the office, and had been enrolled, notwithstanding directions not to enrol it until further order.

This was a petition of a patentee, praying that the enrolment of his patent might be cancelled or vacated, under the following circumstances, stated in the petition:—

The Petitioner obtained a patent, dated the 3d of June 1843, subject to the usual conditions for making it void in default of the patentee enrolling a specification within six months "next and immediately after the date of the letters patent."

The specification being acknowledged by the Petitioner was, on Monday the 4th day of December 1843, taken to the Enrolment Office and delivered to a clerk in attendance there, with written instructions annexed not to enrol it until further order, it being doubtful, [105] whether the enrolment of it on Monday the 4th of December would be in sufficient time to prevent the letters patent from being void.

The written instructions were as follows :—"Brough's specification. To be left at the Enrolment Office; but as yesterday was the last day, and it being doubtful whether the patent is not void, although the last day was on a Sunday, we do not wish it enrolled at present, until further advised as to its utility. If we wish it to be enrolled, it will, of course, be marked as of to-day."

On the 6th of December the Petitioner again called at the Enrolment Office, when the clerk referred to the fact of having received the specifications, upon the terms of the aforesaid instructions, but stated that if it was intended to be enrolled, it was necessary that he should be informed of such intention.

The Petitioner, being advised not to rely on the first patent, applied for a new grant, and there being no opposition, it was probable that the new grant would be completed in a fortnight.

The Petitioner's agent, on the 9th of January, applied at the Enrolment Office for the specification "when he was informed, to his great surprise, that the same had been enrolled, notwithstanding the written instructions to the contrary." The agent required that it might be cancelled, but was ultimately informed that it could not be cancelled without an order of the Master of the Rolls.

The patentee, by his petition, stated, that his interest might be most prejudicially affected, if such unauthorised enrolment was allowed to remain uncanceled and [106] unvacated, and that he would be prepared to enrol a specification of his invention, as soon as the letters patent for which he was applying were sealed, which would be in about a fortnight. He prayed that the enrolment of the patent might be cancelled or vacated.

Mr. James Parker, in support of the petition, referred to Ex parte Peck (1 Bro. C. C. 578).

Jan. 19. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I cannot make any order on this petition. The case cited of Ex parte Beck does not apply; for on enquiry, I find, that in that case there had been no enrolment, and the question was, if there was to be an amendment or a new patent.

Here the specification was taken to the Enrolment Office on the 4th of December, and nothing was done until the 9th of January.

I am of opinion that the specification can be delivered into the office only for the purpose of being enrolled. To make the enrolment is in such a case the sole business of the office; the Petitioner had no right to give special directions to the clerk there, and if he meant to keep any control over the enrolment, he ought to have kept the specification in his own hands. It was no part of the officer's duty to act as the agent of the Petitioner in such a matter.

I had rather not say more as to this matter, or as to the effect of the 3d of December being a Sunday, further, than it appears to me a serious question, whether the Petitioner can be relieved by any authority less than an Act of Parliament.

[107] MARQUIS OF HERTFORD v. LORD LOWTHER. (THE COUNTESS OF BERCHTOLDT'S CASE.) June 9, 10, Dec. 12, 1843.

A testator bequeathed as follows :—"To M. C. B., besides Austrian metalliques for 104,000 florins, I give £5000." By a subsequent codicil he bequeathed as follows :—"Whereas, I have by indorsement on two little parcels, containing 104 Austrian bonds of 1000 florins each, given them to M. C. B.; I confirm said disposition, and add to it £20,000." Held, first, that the testator, as to the Austrian securities, referred to the same subject-matter; and the testator not possessing such securities at his death, that the gift of them failed; and, secondly, that the gifts of the two sums of £5000 and £20,000 (though both were connected with the gift of the same Austrian securities) were cumulative and not substitutional.

Where a testator, having given a general legacy, by a subsequent instrument makes it specific, the ademption of the specific legacy, without more, will not set up the general legacy.

The late Marquis of Hertford, the testator in this cause, having, by several codicils to his will, made large provisions for his ward the Countess Berchtoldt, by a codicil dated Boulogne-sur-Mer, 17th of September 1835, bequeathed as follows:—"To Matilda Countess Berchtoldt, besides Austrian metalliques for 104,000 florins, I give £5000."

By another codicil, dated Milan, 27th of January 1837, he bequeathed as follows:—"Whereas I have, by indorsement on two little parcels containing 104 Austrian bonds of 1000 florins each, given them to Matilda Countess Berchtoldt, I confirm said disposition, and add to it £20,000 English currency."

By a subsequent codicil, dated in April 1839, he ratified and confirmed his will and codicil.

The Master, by his separate report, made pursuant to the decree, found, that the testator did not die possessed of the Austrian metalliques for 104,000 florins (mentioned in the codicil of the 17th of September 1835), or of the 104 Austrian bonds (mentioned in the codicil of the 27th of January 1837); and he therefore found, that the legacies of Austrian metalliques for 104,000 florins, and 104 Austrian bonds of 1000 florins each, [108] were adeemed. And he further found, that the legacy of £20,000, mentioned in the codicil of the 27th of January 1837 was a substitution for the legacy of £5000 mentioned in the codicil of the 17th of September 1835; and in conformity with the finding, the Master, in taking an account of what was due to the Countess Berchtoldt, excluded the bequests contained in the codicil of the 17th of September 1835, and the bequest of 104 Austrian bonds of 1000 florins each, mentioned in the codicil of the 27th of January 1837.

The countess took exceptions to the Master's report, and, admitting the legacy of 104 Austrian bonds for 1000 florins each was a specific legacy and adeemed, she claimed to be entitled to the legacies alleged to be given by the codicil of the 17th of September 1835, and also to the £20,000 given by the codicil of the 27th of January 1837.

Mr. G. Turner and Mr. Tripp, for the Countess Berchtoldt.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh and Mr. Follett, for the executors.

Sir C. Wetherell, Mr. Kindersley, and Mr. Schomburg, for the residuary legatee.

Dec. 12. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. In amount and description, Austrian metalliques for 104,000 florins have the same meaning with 104 Austrian bonds for 1000 florins each; and as to the legacy, it has been argued, 1st, That the first gift was a general [109] legacy. (1) 2dly, That the second gift, which is a specific legacy, was not a substitution for the first (Hurst v. Beach, 5 Mad. 358; Guy v. Sharp, 1 Myl. & K. 589; Robley v. Robley, 2 Beavan, 95; Wray v. Field, 6 Mad. 300; Mackenzie v. Mackenzie, 2 Russ. 262); and, 3dly, That if it ought to be so considered, the ademption of the substituted legacy operated as a revivor of the gift for which it was substituted.

Looking minutely at the words used by the testator in both the codicils in question; observing that in the second of them he evidently treated the gift as having been made by the indorsement on the parcels, and that by the first of them he rather alludes to the gift as having been otherwise made, than as being then made, I think that he must be considered as referring to the same subject-matter, the same specific legacy in both instruments, and that in the two codicils he was not intending to make two distinct gifts, or two gifts of which the last was to be a substitution for the first, but was intending to allude to one gift otherwise made; but if the case were otherwise, if the first of these two codicils gave a general legacy, and the second a specific legacy, I should be of opinion that the subject of the gift was the same. It does not, indeed, appear by proof, that the testator actually possessed Austrian metalliques for 104,000 florins on the 17th of September 1835. It may possibly, however improbably, have been, as now argued, that he meant such securities to that amount to be purchased, out of his general estate, for the legatee, and that he afterwards purchased the same amount himself, and made a specific gift or legacy of them. Even if this improbable state of facts appeared, I could [110] not find any ground for presuming that he intended to give the amount as a specific legacy in one codicil, and leave his executors, acting under the former codicil, subject to the obligation of purchasing an equal amount for the same legatee out of his general assets. I should find it necessary to conclude, that the specific legacy was intended to be a substitution for the first; and if the testator himself made a legacy specific, which was at first intended to be general, I am of opinion that the ademption of the specific legacy, without more, would not set up the general legacy. It therefore appears to me that the Master's report is right, in not finding anything to be due to the Countess Berchtoldt in respect of the 104,000 florins mentioned in the two codicils.

The Master has further considered, that the gifts of sterling money mentioned with the 104,000 florins in the two codicils were connected with the gifts of florins so closely, as to make, in each case, an united legacy; and that the legacy in the latter codicil, florins and sterling money together, were a substitution for the legacy in the former codicil, florins and sterling money together. He has also considered, that the gift of florins in the second of the two codicils, being specific and adeemed, left the £20,000 a gift in substitution for the £5000 in the former codicil. The question appears to me to be attended with some doubt, but, upon consideration, I am unable to concur in the Master's view of the case. Looking at the several codicils annexed to the will, I think that if the 104,000 florins had never been mentioned, the legatee, the Countess Berchtoldt, would have been entitled to the £5000 given by the codicil of the 17th of September 1835, and also to the £20,000 mentioned in the codicil of the 27th of January 1837.

[111] The idea of substitution arises from the connection of the gifts of sterling money with the gifts of florins. They might have been so connected, so united or consolidated, that upon the failure or ademption of the gift of florins there might have been a failure or ademption of the gift of sterling money; but this is not found or even contended for. What then is the nature of the connection between two gifts, which admits of one standing, whilst the other fails, and yet communicates a qualification, which excludes addition to a former gift, and introduces substitution for it? It would be vain to conjecture, for what reason the gifts of sterling money were at all connected with the gifts of florins; but what the testator seems to have, in effect, said, is, first, I have given Countess Berchtoldt 104,000 florins, and I give her besides £5000 sterling; secondly, I have given Countess Berchtoldt 104,000 florins by indorsement on two little parcels, and I add to it £20,000 British currency.

On the best consideration which I can give to the subject, and differing from the Master with reluctance, because I think the question doubtful, it appears to me, that the two gifts of sterling money may well stand together; and having read through all the codicils, with the view of ascertaining from the various modes in which the testator has expressed himself, what was probably his intention, I am of opinion that the £20,000 ought not to be taken as a substitution for, but as an addition to, the gift of £5000, and that in this respect, the exception must be allowed.

Affirmed by the Lord Chancellor, 11th of February 1845.

Settlement by the heir, upon his marriage, of the ancestor's estates, supported against the claims of the specialty creditors of such ancestor.

Sir W. H. died indebted in specialty. After his death, on the marriage of his heiress, a settlement was executed, whereby (after reciting the insufficiency of the personal estate to pay the debts, and that a considerable sum was due on that account) a part of the estates were conveyed to provide a fund to pay the debts, and the remainder was settled on the heiress, her intended husband, and their issue. Many years after, the produce of the estates appropriated to the payment of the debts was found insufficient. Held, that the circumstances did not afford any proof of fraud, or any want of bona fides in the execution of the settlement, that the settled estates were not liable to the specialty debts; and that even if a want of bona fides had appeared, relief could only be obtained in a suit putting the mala fides properly in issue.

This case came before the Court upon exceptions to the Master's report. Several of the circumstances of the case will be found in a former report of Farrow v. Rees (4 Beav. 18).

Sir Watts Horton died on the 5th of November 1811, indebted on specialties in which his heirs were bound.

He left an only daughter his heiress at law. The real estate of which he was entitled to dispose consisted of reversions, one of which fell into possession upon his own death. By his will, he devised his real estate to his wife for life, with remainder to his daughter. He did not charge his real estate with the payment of his debts, and his personal estate was found insufficient to pay them.

In the year 1813 Miss Horton married the Defendant Mr. Rees. On that occasion, and in consideration of the then intended marriage, and for the purpose of providing a fund for payment of the debts, an indenture, dated the 5th of July 1813, was executed, by and between the Defendant Mr. Rees of the first part, Miss Horton (described as the heir of Sir Watts) of the second part, Lady Horton of the third part, Lord Stanley and Wil-[113]-liam Horton of the fourth part, and William Cross and John Lee of the fifth part. This deed, amongst other things, recited that the personal estate of Sir Watts was insufficient for the payment of his debts, and that a considerable sum was due on that account, which it had always been the wish of Lady Horton and Miss Horton to discharge: that a marriage was intended between Mr. Rees and Miss Horton, and that on the treaty for the same, it had been agreed, that a part of the estates should be sold, for the purpose of providing a fund for the payment of all the debts of Sir Watts, and that the other estates should be settled; and that for the purpose of enabling her daughter to make the settlement, Lady Horton had agreed to relinquish the life-estate given to her by the will; and it was thereby witnessed, that the estates were conveyed by Lady Horton and Miss Horton to Lord Stanley and William Horton, as to part of them, in trust to sell and to apply the money arising from the sale in payment of all the debts of Sir Watts, and after full payment thereof, to pay any surplus to Mr. Rees; and, until the sale, the rents of these estates were made payable to the person, who, for the time being, should be in possession of the other estates. The remainder of the estates were to be held in trust for Mr. Rees for life; after his death, provision was made for payment of a jointure to his widow, and portions for the younger children of the marriage, and, subject thereto, the estates were limited to the first and other sons of the marriage.

The bill in this cause was filed in 1824, by unsatisfied specialty creditors of Sir Watts Horton. It was not thereby alleged that the settlement was in any manner fraudulent; but it was charged, that if the personal estate was insufficient for the payment of the debts of Sir Watts, the deficiency ought to be made good out of the real estates devised to Miss Horton, subject to the [114] life-estate of Lady Horton, or which descended on Miss Horton; and that, notwithstanding the settlement, the specialty creditors were entitled to have a sufficient part of all the estates therein comprised, sold, to supply the deficiency of the personal estate. The bill prayed for the usual accounts; and if the personal estate and also the money arising from the sale of the estates conveyed to be sold should be insufficient for payment of the debts, that the deficiency should be raised by sale or mortgage of the other real estates of the testator.

The Defendants, Mr. and Mrs. Rees and Lady Horton, in their answer, stated their belief, that the provision made by the settlement for the payment of all the debts of Sir Watts was fully sufficient for that purpose, except such of the debts as were secured by mortgage. The bill charged no fraud, and the answer, necessarily, contained no defence to any imputation of fraud.

The decree ordered that the usual accounts of the personal estate, and of the monies arising from the sale of the estates conveyed to be sold, should be taken, and directed the due application thereof; and, if the personal estate and those monies should be insufficient for the payment of the debts, it was ordered that the Master should take an account of the real estate of the testator liable to pay his debts.

The Master, having found that the personal estate and the purchase-monies of the estates sold were insufficient to pay the debts, proceeded to take an account of the real estates of the testator liable to pay his debts; and it appearing that all the unsold estates were subject to the trusts of the settlement, he found that there was no real estate of the testator liable to pay his debts. The Plaintiff took exceptions to his report.

[116] Lady Horton and Mrs. Rees were now both dead; but there was issue of the marriage between Mr. and Mrs. Rees.

Mr. Turner and Mr. Rogers, for the Plaintiff, in support of the exceptions. Though the estate was reversionary, still it formed assets for the payment of the testator's specialty debts; and it would have been decreed to be sold for that purpose; Tyndale v. Warre (Jacob, 212).

At the time of the testator's death, his real estate was liable to the payment of his specialty debts: the remedy of the specialty creditors would not have been merely personal against the heir, in respect of assets descended, but the testator's estate would specifically have been made applicable to the payment of the debts. Even at law the judgment would be that the creditor "do recover his debt and costs, to be levied of the lands and tenements which were of the testator in fee-simple at the time of his death (Tidd's Forms, 389);" and in equity the estate would have been ordered to be sold for payment. (Seton's Decrees, 84.) The Court would order a receiver, upon a deficiency of personal estate, and restrain a purchaser from paying the heir; Green v. Loves (3 B. C. C. 217). Such were the rights of the parties at the death of the testator: the question is, whether the heiress, by a settlement of the estate on herself and her family, could defeat those rights. By the statute of Elizabeth (13 Eliz. c. 5, s. 2), all alienations and conveyances, for the intent and purpose to delay, hinder, or defraud creditors, are declared to be clearly and utterly void. This settlement was a mere shift and contrivance of the [116] heiress, who was bound by the obligation of her ancestor, to delay the creditors, and would be void under the statute. The statute of the 3 & 4 W. & M. c. 14 makes wills void, as against creditors by bond binding the testator's heirs, and gives a remedy against the heir and devise jointly; and the fifth section makes the heir answerable, in cases where he sells before action brought; and execution may be taken out as if the debt were the debt of the heir, "saving that the lands, tenements, and hereditaments bond fide aliened before the action brought shall not be liable to such execution," intimating clearly, that the lands not bond fide aliened (as in the present case) are still to be liable. By the combined operation of these two statutes, the estate still remains liable to the claim of the bond creditors.

The heir at law, like an executor, must have the means of selling the real estate for the purpose of providing a fund for the discharge of the specialty debts, and a bond fide sale for that purpose would be protected; but by settling the property on the heiress's family, no fund could possibly arise for the discharge of the debts: its object, on the face of it, was not to pay the debts, but to exclude the rights of the creditors. The settlement recites that a considerable sum was due on account of the debts of the testator, and that the personal estate was insufficient for the payment, and yet it is attempted, by that deed, to withdraw the real estate, which was the only means of payment, from the creditors. Every person taking under the settlement had notice that the heiress was improperly dealing with the estate for her own benefit, and not for the purpose of raising a fund for payment of the specialty debts. They are, therefore, bound by that notice, and can claim no more than what, in equity, the settlor herself was entitled to.

[117] That a conveyance by the heir may be fraudulent against the creditors of the ancestor, was decided so long back as the time of Lord Coke. In Gooch's case (5 Reports, 60 a.) the ancestor was indebted in bond; an action was brought against the heir, who pleaded riens per descent, and he proved that, before the action brought, he had enfeoffed W. G. in fee of the descended lands, but the Plaintiff's counsel alleged and proved, that the feoffment was made by fraud and convin, to defraud the Plaintiff of his action, and therefore void by the statute of 13 Eliz. c. 5, as to the Plaintiff, and it was so held by the whole Court.

Again, a Court of Equity will relieve in such a case; Bateman v. Bateman (1 Eq. Ca. Abr. 149, pl. 6). Where "a man bound himself and his heirs in a bond, and died leaving a real estate to descend to his heir, and the heir having aliened the real estate, the obligee brought a bill against the heir and purchaser, to be relieved, on the statute (of 3 & 4 W. & M.) against fraudulent devises, and the Lord Chancellor relieved him."

A purchaser, where there are debts, is not required to see to the application of the purchase-money; "but if the nature of the transaction affords intrinsic evidence, that the executor, in the mortgage or sale, is not acting in the execution of his duty, but is committing a breach of trust, as where the consideration of the mortgage or sale is a personal debt due from the executors to the mortgagee or purchaser, there such mortgagee or purchaser, being a party to the breach of trust, does not hold the property discharged from the trusts, but equally subject to the payment of debts and legacies, as it would have [118] been in the hands of the executor. The same principle is applied to real estate." Watkins v. Cheek (2 Sim. & S. 199).

The fact of notice makes this case differ from those decided. In Mathews v. Jones (2 Anst. 506) the Defendants were not charged with notice (Ib. p. 511) of the existence of any of the testator's debts; and in Spackman v. Timbrell (8 Sim. 253) there was no notice of the existence of any debts.

In Higgins v. Shaw (2 Dr. & War. 356) the Court said, "If a man sells lands which are subject to bond or other specialty debts, this Court presumes that the purchase-money is to be applied to the discharge of those debts; and that the sale is made with that view, and the purchaser will be discharged. But this is a different case, for here the party does not sell, he merely settles the estate. The case as against John is still stronger—he first wasted the assets, and then, two years after the filing of the bill, put the estate into settlement."

At all events, the life-estate of the husband is still liable to the specialty creditors: it is the estate to which he would be entitled, jure mariti, independent of the settlement, and still forms part of the testator's estate. Where a fraud is committed, the Court will lay hold of the interest of any party concerned in it, as an indemnity to the parties injured. Burridge v. Row (1 Y. & C. (N. C.) 183).

Mr. Pemberton Leigh and Mr. Koe, for Mr. Rees and his son. The question is, whether a mere specialty debt, which is neither charged by will or otherwise on an estate, but is a simple legal liability to be enforced by [119] action or suit against the person and property of the debtor, constitutes a charge or lien on the estate of the deceased debtor, or remains, after his death, a pure legal demand, to be enforced against the heir in the usual way.

Here is a bond debt which, in the lifetime of the testator, formed no charge or lien on his estate, how, then, did it become a charge or lien after his death? There is no charge of debts in the will, nor any trust for their payment. It is said that it must be a charge, because, upon a judgment or decree, payment would be enforced out of the testator's estate: it is quite true that payment would be so enforced, but that is by force of the judgment: it is no more than would have resulted from a judgment or decree against the testator himself in his lifetime; but here there is no judgment. The class of cases like Watkins v. Cheek has no application, for there there was a trust created by the testator, here there is none.

It is said that the settlement was fraudulent and void under the statute of Elizabeth; but that statute has no application to a case where full valuable consideration is given for the property. The consideration of marriage has always been held to be sufficient to support any settlement. In a case before Sir William Grant, a stockbroker, greatly indebted, married his mistress, and settled his property on her: it was supported even against his creditors. (Campion v. Cotton, 17 Ves. 263.) If Sir Watts Horton himself had settled the estate on the marriage of his daughter, could it have been impeached by his creditors? How, then, does it differ that the heiress, contracting with an intended husband, made the settlement? The value of the estates exceeded the testator's debts, and by the set-[120]-tlement a provision was made for their payment, which at the time was ample, and it is not now shewn that it is insufficient.

The statute of the 3 & 4 William and Mary (repealed and re-enacted by the 11 G. 4, and 1 W. 4, c. 47) does not affect the question. Previous to that Act, the devisee was not liable to the testator's debts, and the creditors might also be defeated by the alienation of the heir before action brought. To remedy this, the Act avoids the devise as against the creditor, and enables him to maintain an action jointly against the heir and devisee. By the 5th section the heir is made answerable for the land aliened by him before action, and a similar liability is imposed on the devisee. The statute gives these remedies to the creditor, but in no way permits him to follow the estate into the hands of a purchaser for valuable consideration.

This case was decided in Spackman v. Timbrell (8 Sim. 253): there A., who was a trader at his death, and indebted by specialty and simple contract, devised freehold estates to his son in fee. The son, on his marriage, settled the estates on his wife and children, and afterwards died. It was held that the 3 & 4 W. & M. c. 14, and the 47 G. 3, c. 74, sess. 2 did not charge the real assets, descended or devised, with the ancestor's debts, but made the heir or devisee personally liable, to the value of the assets; and, therefore, that the son's widow and children were entitled to hold the estates, discharged from the debts of the father. In that case the settlement recited the will and the devise for payment of the debts; and the notice thereby given was relied on in argument, but did not prevail. Again, in Matheus v. Jones (3 Anstr. 506), a marriage settlement of the ancestor's estate [121] by the heir, who was also devisee, was supported against a bond creditor of the ancestor. Notice of the testator's debts can make no difference; for if the debt be not a charge on the estate, no notice can make it so.

Lastly, the case now attempted to be made is not stated on the pleadings, and the parties have had no opportunity of meeting it.

Mr. Turner, in reply. To take a case out of the statute of Elizabeth, not only must the conveyance be on good consideration, but bonâ fide, and without notice of "covein, fraud, or collusion."

The following cases were referred to in the course of the argument:—Townsend v. Westacott (2 Beav. 340, and 4 Beav. 58); Partridge v. Gopp (Ambl. 596); Braithwaite v. Britain (1 Keen, 206); Ex parte Morton (5 Ves. 449); Rogers v. Rogers (6 Sim. 364).

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. It is clear, that the specialty creditors of Sir Watts Horton might, on his death, by adopting the proper proceedings, have obtained payment out of his real estates; but it is equally clear that the bond debts did not of themselves constitute a lien or charge upon those estates. The estates might have been made available: the heir, to the extent of assets, was bound to pay the specialty debts; and, by the statute, the devisee is placed, substantially and for all practical purposes, in the same situation as the heir.

What has occurred is this:—The estates appropriated by the settlement to the payment of the debts have [122] been sold, and after allowing all proper deductions, the sum of £5110 remains for the payment of debts, amounting to £7174. The fund being insufficient, the question is, whether the creditors have a right to resort to the estate settled by the deed of 1813?

The question arises in a very singular form. It is strange, if it was intended to raise a question so important as this, that a distinct declaration should not have been asked, and still more strange, that it should not have been provided for by the decree. It is now argued that this settlement, though in consideration of marriage, was executed under such circumstances, that it cannot be held to have been made bona fide. If the Plaintiff sought to set it aside on the ground that it was not executed bona fide, would it not be proper that all the circumstances from which the mala fides was to be inferred should be stated? and ought not its invalidity to have been expressly charged by the bill, in order that the Defendants might have the means of meeting it?

The Master, in proceeding under the decree, has thought that the settlement was a valid alienation, and that the settled estates are not liable to the specialty debts. This is the question which, upon the exceptions to his report, I shall have to consider. Several authorities have been referred to, and I confess I think that the doctrine laid down in that of Mathews v. Jones extremely applicable to the present case; the only difference between the two cases is the notice.

Dec. 16. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The only question upon these exceptions is, whether the testator's real estates, which were comprised in the settlement of the daughter, and limited on the trusts of [123] the settlement, are, in the hands of the persons claiming under the settlement, liable to the payment of the testator's specialty debts.

Debts by specialty, in which the heirs are bound, constitute no lien or charge upon the land, either in the hands of the debtor or of his heir. Notwithstanding the existence of such debts, the debtor himself may alienate the land, or he may, by will, make it equitable assets, thereby preventing its exclusive application to the payment of specialty debts, or, as Lord C. J. Willes says (Willes, 524), he may devise it for the payment of a particular debt on simple contract, and so withdraw it from specialty creditors altogether.

By taking proper proceedings, the specialty creditors may obtain payment, out of the descended or devised real estate in the hands of the heir or devisee; but if such proceedings are not taken, the heir or devisee may alienate, and in the hands of the alienee, the land is not liable, though the heir or devisee remains personally liable, to the extent of the value of the land alienated.

The difference which arises from the alienation appears strongly in the case of a mortgagor becoming subsequently indebted to the mortgagee on bond, and then dying. The heir cannot himself redeem the mortgage without paying the bond; but the assignee of the equity of redemption from the heir may redeem the mortgage without paying the bond. (Coleman v. Winch, 1 P. Williams, 775.)

The heir, being named in the obligation, is considered to be himself a debtor, not indeed a debtor liable to pay [124] the debt under all circumstances, but liable to the extent of the value of the real estate descended, and he is not restrained from alienation; but after the alienation, he is personally liable to pay his ancestor's debts, to the amount of the value of the land he has alienated.

The case of Mathews v. Jones (2 Anstr. 506) sufficiently establishes, that, in the absence of any special circumstances, the land, after an alienation by the heir for the purposes of a marriage settlement, is not liable to the specialty debts of the ancestor.

But in this case it has been argued, that the settlement is fraudulent and void under the statute of 13 Eliz. c. 5. Miss Horton, as heir of the reversion, being owner of the land, and Miss Horton being debtor under the obligation of her father, it is said that the settlement was prejudicial to the creditors, and therefore void.

Admitting, on the authority of Gooch's case (5 Co. Rep. 60 a.) and the case of Apharry v. Bodingham (Cro. Eliz. 350), that cases of this kind may fall within the statute, the enactment makes void any conveyance executed with the intent or purpose to delay, hinder, or defraud creditors of their just and lawful actions, suits, or reliefs; but it is not to extend to any interest, upon good consideration, and bona fide conveyed to any person not having notice of the fraud.

In this case the settlement was made, in consideration of marriage, a good and valuable consideration, and the alienation left the heir subject to personal liability.

[125] No direct or express fraud is proved or attempted to be proved. If any fraud there were, it must be detected and established by inference from independent facts distinctly proved, or from the provisions of the deed itself; and it may reasonably be asked, was it false to allege, as was professed by the deed, that the parties desired and intended that all the debts should be fully paid? Were the estates conveyed to be sold at the time inadequate for the full payment of the debts? If so, were they known to be inadequate, so that the provision pretended to be for the payment of the debts was not only insufficient but delusive? Was the heir who alienated the land insolvent, so that her personal liability was accompanied by inability to pay, and of no value, and the alienation of the land removed from the creditor the only means by which he had any prospect of obtaining payment? Were the creditors in any way delayed or hindered? There has been, indeed, very great delay, but has it arisen from, or was it intended to be occasioned by, the deed? Nothing of the kind is even alleged, but the imputation of fraud rests upon this:—that the parties to the settlement, knowing that there were debts of Sir Watts Horton remaining unpaid, and setting apart only a portion of the estates to provide a fund for the payment of those debts, settled the remainder, providing, at the same time, that the rents of the estate set apart for the debts, should, until the estates were sold, be paid to Mr. Rees; and that since those estates have been sold, upon an account taken after a lapse of about thirty years, without one word of explanation, either as to the cause of the delay or the cause of the defalcation, the produce of the sales is found to be insufficient for the full payment of the debts and the interest which has accumulated upon them.

I am of opinion that these circumstances, thus barely appearing, do not afford any proof of fraud or any want [126] of bona fides in the execution of the settlement, and that the exceptions must therefore be overruled.

But I think it right to add, that even if the circumstances had been such, as to afford a probable reason for thinking that there was such a want of bona fides, as might entitle the creditor to relief, I should nevertheless have been of opinion, that such relief could not have been had in this suit.

The bill is founded upon the notion that the claim of the creditor to be paid out of the real estate was, in no respect, altered by the alienation or settlement made by the devisee and heir. It charges none of the fraud upon which the creditor now insists, and the Defendants have had no means of placing upon the record and proving such defence, as they might have been enabled to make if the charge had been made; and I do not think, that by a decree directing an account to be taken of a testator's real estate liable to the payment of his debts, it was meant to refer such a question as has been raised upon the exceptions to the Master's report.

[Affirmed by Lord Chancellor, 2 L. T. (O. S.), 205.]

Injunction granted, prohibitory in form, but mandatory in its effect.

Tenant of a mine restrained, on motion, from permitting a communication with an adjoining mine to continue open, and water to flow through the same, the effect intended being to compel the Defendants to close the communication.

Arbitration clauses in deeds are not binding on the parties, so as to oust the jurisdiction of the Court.

This was an application for an injunction to restrain the Defendants, who were the lessees of the Plaintiffs' coal mine, from acting in contravention of the covenants contained in their lease.

In February 1839 the Plaintiffs granted to the Defendants a lease of a coal mine in the county of York, at a rent of £520, with a proportionable increased rent for all coal worked beyond two acres annually. The Defendants, amongst other things, covenanted not to permit any of the brick clay to be carried off the land; to work the seam in a fair and workmanlike manner; to leave proper and sufficient barriers in the said seam or bed of coal against all adjoining collieries: to prevent the draining or laying dry any such other mines, seams, or beds; and the Defendants further covenanted, not to work, get, or raise up, from the pits or shafts to be sunk and made by them, or carry over the demised premises, any coal belonging to other proprietors, without the consent in writing of the Plaintiffs.

The lease contained a proviso, that if any dispute, doubt, or question, should arise between the Plaintiffs and the Defendants, either on the construction of the lease, or respecting any matter or thing whatsoever, arising out of or connected with the demise or lease, or any of the covenants, conditions, stipulations, and provisions therein before contained, then every such dispute, doubt, or question should be referred to the arbitration of two indifferent questions, one to be named by each party in dispute. And it was thereby further agreed, that their submission to reference might be [128] made a rule of Her Majesty's Court of Queen's Bench. And it was thereby further agreed, that no suit at law or in equity should be commenced or instituted by either of the parties in dispute, against the other of them, touching the matters in dispute, before the parties to be made Defendants to such suit or suits should have refused, or neglected to refer the matters in difference respectively, or unless the time limited for making such award or determination should have expired, without any such award or determination having been made.

The bill, the material allegations of which were verified, alleged that in December 1842 the Plaintiffs' agents discovered, as the fact was, that the Defendants had not left proper and sufficient barriers in the seam or bed of coal, and that they had made a communication or road in the bed of coal into an adjoining coal-field, the property of Sir John Lowther; that they had commenced working the coal of Sir John Lowther, and had worked, gotten, or raised up, from the pits or shafts sunk by them on the property comprised in the aforesaid indenture, and had also carried over the premises comprised in the aforesaid indenture coal belonging to Sir John Lowther; that the Defendants, by means of the aforesaid communication, conducted the water from the seam of coal of Sir John Lowther, into the seam of coal demised to the Defendants by the aforesaid indenture, and that they raised the same by means of the said pits or shafts; that the Defendants had thereby drained or laid dry the mines, seams or beds of coal on the property of Sir John Lowther, and had conveyed the coal gotten by them from the property of Sir John Lowther along the railway and staith on the premises comprised in the aforesaid indenture. The bill also alleged, that [129] the Defendants had made bricks and tiles on the property, which they had carried off the premises.

The Plaintiffs now moved for an injunction to restrain the Defendants from carrying the brick clay, or bricks or tiles made thereof, off the land; from working away sufficient barriers in the seam in the parts adjoining; from making a communication into adjoining collieries, and from draining any other mines, or permitting the same to be drained, by means of the demised colliery; and from permitting the communication complained of to continue open, and from permitting any water to flow through the same into the demised colliery, and from raising, by means of the shafts on the demised premises, any coal of any other proprietor, and from carrying the same over the demised premises; and from doing, &c., any act, &c., in breach of the covenants in the lease.

The affidavit in support of the motion verified the statements in the bill, and also stated that, by erecting proper dams or barriers, the said communication might be blocked up, and the water prevented flowing from the said property of Sir J. Lowther into the bed or seam of coal comprised in the aforesaid indenture.

The affidavits in opposition stated, that there was a fall or dip from the Plaintiffs' collieries to those of Sir John Lowther; that consequently all the water necessarily flowed towards Sir John Lowther's coal, and not towards the bed or seam of coal demised by the Plaintiffs to the Defendants; and that the effect of the communication would be, to materially benefit and improve the property and mines of the Plaintiffs, and diminish the expense of working the same.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The only question in this case, is as to the form and the extent of the injunction to be granted.

From the course of the argument, one would really think, that some doubt had arisen as to the jurisdiction of the Court to compel parties to perform their covenants and agreements, and that the jurisdiction of this Court, to prevent parties from wilfully and avowedly violating contracts deliberately entered into, had become perfectly unnecessary.

What are the facts? A lease of a coal mine was granted by the Plaintiffs; certain covenants required by one party were entered into, and agreed to by the other, and constituted a portion of the consideration upon which the contract was founded. It is now plainly admitted by the Defendants, that they have acted in direct violation of those covenants, and an application being made to this Court to prevent that violation being continued, it is said, in answer by the Defendants, "We have indeed violated the covenants, but we have not done it in a way prejudicial to you; on the contrary, according to our judgment and the view we take of your case, this is a very profitable and beneficial proceeding for you, and you must abide by our judgment." It is sufficient to say, that the Plaintiffs have a right to insist on their own view of their own interest, and that even if it should be as beneficial to them, as has been argued on the other side, they may nevertheless choose [131] to insist on having the terms of the contract strictly obeyed.

Next it is said, "You had notice of this long before you filed your bill; a treaty for compensation took place after you were aware of it, and if the proposed compensation had satisfied you, you would never have complained of this violation." It is possible that the parties who stipulated for the benefit of these covenants would have waived them, and they might have entered into a treaty for the purpose of considering whether such a compensation in damages would be made, as would have induced them to waive the agreement. But here the case is otherwise: they were not satisfied, and they therefore demand the strict performance of the contract.

With regard to the length of time, nothing can be more true than this—if parties come and ask for an injunction ex parte, the Court looks most minutely to the time in which they have permitted the matter complained of to proceed, and will not allow them to obtain an injunction in the absence of the other party, when they have themselves, for some time, acquiesced. It is quite reasonable that that should be so, because the granting of an injunction ex parte is the exercise of a very extraordinary jurisdiction, the effect of which, in every case in which it is asked, is almost alarming; therefore the time at which the Plaintiff first had notice of the existence of the subject of complaint, is looked to with the greatest care and jealousy, in order to prevent an improper order being made against a party in his absence; but when the party has notice of the motion, the question then is entirely of a different kind. The question then is, whether, during the time which has elapsed, there has been a course of conduct from which a waiver of the terms or an acquiescence in the violation of the [132] contract is to be inferred. That is quite another thing, and there is nothing at all like it in this case.

The next thing said is, "You have accepted a compensation for increased work, and a sum of money has been paid now in respect of it;" but the answer is, that there is, in other respects, a continued violation of the covenants, and no acquiescence in the violation.

The remaining argument is, that the deed contains a clause for a reference to arbitration. Now there are a great number of cases in which, from the difficulty of ascertaining the truth and the great complication of the rights and interests involved, it is almost impossible for the Court to do strict justice between parties within such limits of time and expense as are in any degree proportionate to the value of the interests in question. Many cases occur, in which it is perfectly clear, that by means of a reference to arbitration, the real interests of the parties will be much better satisfied than they could be by any litigation in a Court of Justice. In these cases the Court has shewn itself very anxious that matters of this kind should be determined in a way most beneficial to the parties, and much more so, when it finds that the parties, anticipating difficulties of that kind, have provided for their settlement by arbitration. It has, however, been decided, that these clauses for a reference are not binding upon the parties, who cannot contract themselves out of their right to have their disputes settled in Courts of Justice. Notwithstanding the many cases in which a reference to arbitration may justly be preferred to prolonged litigation in Court, cases without end arise, in which, by no possibility, could arbitrators do that justice which the powers of Courts of Justice enable them to administer. Cases arise which were not in the contemplation of the parties when they entered into their agreement. It has, under these circumstances, been, I [133] think, justly held, that arbitration clauses are not to be enforced against the parties, and I find nothing in the wording of these particular clauses which at all alters this case.

Upon none of these grounds do I think the Plaintiffs have, in any way, disentitled themselves to the protection of this Court, or to their right to insist in this Court that the covenants which they have contracted for shall from day to day be obeyed by the Defendants. Nevertheless, it is very important to consider what the terms of the injunction are to be; I do not think it ought to extend beyond the violations which have taken place; it ought not to be expressed in such general terms as may imply that the Defendants intend to violate those covenants which they have hitherto respected. This motion asks for something more than ordinary; namely, to restrain the Defendants permitting water to flow through the communication. It is however no unusual thing to ask an injunction in this form: I think it was granted in the case of Robinson v. Lord Byron, (1) and in other cases. Indeed, I believe that in another branch of the Court, some few years ago, a direct order was made for the party to do that which was required, to put an end to the violation of covenants: I do not however know whether that has been since acted upon, and I do not mean to deviate from the regular and established practice. The injunction therefore must be confined to those things in respect [134] of which at this time and upon the evidence before me, it appears that the Plaintiffs require protection, and it should not extend to the last general words; this Court never, without necessity, presumes there will be a violation of the covenants.

The injunction was granted in the terms of the notice of motion, omitting the last clause. The order was affirmed on appeal, 9th December 1843.

[134] BARKER v. BUTTRESS. Dec. 14, 15, 1843.

[S. C. 13 L. J. Ch. 58; 8 Jur. 89. See Ex parte Gouthwaite, 1851, 3 Mac. & G. 203; 42 E. R. 237.]

The remedies given by the Banking Act (7 G. 4, c. 46) are not cumulative, but substitutional for the prior liabilities of partners, and therefore proceedings cannot be had against a party three years after he has ceased to be a member.

A person at his death was member of a banking company established under the 7 G. 4, c. 46, and subject to its liabilities. After the expiration of three years, a suit was instituted for the administration of his estate, and the common decree was made for taking an account of his debts. Persons who were creditors of the banking company at the testator's death claimed before the Master. Held, that their claims did not come within the scope of the decree; secondly, that their claims were barred by the lapse of three years; and, thirdly, that the proper way of bringing their claims before the Court was by petition, and not by exception.

(1) 1 B. C. C. 588. And see Blakemore v. The Glamorganshire Canal Company, 1 M. & K. 154; Milligan v. Mitchell, Id. 452; Lane v. Newdigate, 10 Ves. 192; Nutbrown v. Thornton, Id. 159; Rankin v. Huskisson, 4 Sim. 13; Taylor v. Davis, 3 Beav. 388, n. (e.); Spencer v. The London and Birmingham Railway Company, 8 Sim. 193; Squire v. Campbell, 1 Myl. & Cr. 465, 467; Whittaker v. Howe, 3 Beav. 387 and 395, n.; The Great North of England, &c., Railway v. The Clarence Railway, 1 Collyer, 507.

The question in this case depended on the construction of the Banking Act (7 Geo. 4, c. 46). It will therefore be convenient, in the first place, to refer to its provisions, so far as it affected the present case.

By the 1st section, banking co-partnerships, though consisting of more than six persons, may issue bills payable on demand, at any place exceeding sixty-five miles from London; but that section also provides as follows: "That every member of any such corporation or co-partnership shall be liable to, and responsible for, the due payment of all bills and notes which shall be issued, and for all sums of money which shall be borrowed, owed, or taken up by the corporation or co-part-[135]nership of which such person shall be a member, such person being a member at the period of the date of the bills or notes, or becoming or being a member, before or at the time of the bills or notes being payable, or being such member at the time of the borrowing, owing, or taking up of any sum or sums of money upon any bills or notes, by the corporation or co-partnership, or while any sum of money on any bills or notes is owing or unpaid, or at the time the same became due from the corporation or co-partnership, any agreement, covenant, or contract to the contrary notwithstanding."

The 9th section provides, that the co-partnerships "shall and lawfully may" sue and be sued in the name of the registered "public officer."

The 10th section is as follows:—"That no person or persons, or body or bodies politic or corporate, having or claiming to have any demand upon or against any such corporation or co-partnership, shall bring more than one action or suit, in case the merits shall have been tried in such action or suit, in respect of such demand; and the proceedings in any action or suit by or against any one of the public officers, nominated as aforesaid, for the time being of any such co-partnership, may be pleaded in bar of any other action or actions, suit or suits, for the same demand, by or against any other of the public officers of such co-partnership."

By the 11th section, decrees in equity against the public officer are to have the like effect against the property of the co-partnership, and the persons and property of the members, as if such members were parties to the suit; and by the 12th section, judgments and decrees are to have the same effect on the property and [136] members as if such judgment had been recovered against the co-partnership.

The 13th section is as follows:—"That execution upon any judgment, in any action obtained against any public officer for the time being of any such corporation or co-partnership carrying on the business of banking under the provisions of this Act, whether as Plaintiff or Defendant, may be issued against any member or members for the time being of such corporation or co-partnership; and that in case any such execution against any member or members for the time being of any such corporation or co-partnership shall be ineffectual for obtaining payment and satisfaction of the amount of such judgment, it shall be lawful for the party or parties, so having obtained judgment against such public officer for the time being, to issue execution against any person or persons, who was or were a member or members of such corporation or co-partnership at the time when the contract or contracts, or engagement or engagements in which such judgment may have been obtained, was or were entered into, or became a member at any time before such contracts or engagements were executed, or was a member at the time of the judgment obtained. Provided always, that no such execution as last mentioned shall be issued, without leave first granted, on motion in open Court, by the Court in which such judgment shall have been obtained, and when motion shall be made, on notice to the person or persons sought to be charged, nor after the expiration of three years next after any such person or persons shall have ceased to be a member or members of such corporation or co-partnership."

The facts which gave rise to this cause were shortly as follows:—Mr. Barker, the testator in this case, died [137] on the 16th of March 1839. At the time of his death, he was a member of a banking company established under the above Act, called the "Imperial Bank of England," and he had been a registered member since November 1838. (NOTE.—The particulars relating to this company will be found in Wallworth v. Holt, 4 Myl. & Cr. 619.)

Shortly after his death, viz., on the 30th of April 1839, the bank stopped payment, and was found insolvent. In June 1839 John Wood recovered a judgment against the registered public officer of the bank for £4600; in September following, T. L. Rushton obtained a similar judgment for £2001; and on the 8th of August 1840 Nicholas Wood obtained a similar judgment for £24,819. The principal part of these sums was, at the death of the testator, due from the company, as indorsees of bills, and on a banking account.

On the 20th of July 1842 this suit was instituted by legatees, for the administration of the testator's estate; and on the 20th of December 1842 a decree was made, referring it to the Master, in the usual form, to take an account of debts, funeral expenses, and legacies of the testator. The above-named creditors of the bank went in under the decree, and claimed to be creditors of the testator, but the Master having rejected their claims, two of them took exceptions to his report, and the third presented a petition, praying that the Petitioner might be admitted to prove his debt, and that the Master might be directed to admit the Petitioner to prove, or for liberty to except to the report.

Mr. Temple and Mr. Lovat, in support of the exceptions.

[138] Mr. Bazalgette, in support of the petition, argued as follows:—The testator in his lifetime was liable to the claimants, and nothing has since happened to release his assets from the obligation. Though, at law, the liability of a party upon a joint debt ceases on his death, by surviving to the joint contractors, yet, in equity, the estate of the deceased partner continues liable. Devaynes v. Noble (Sleech's case) (1 Mer. 539, and 2 R. & M. 495), Winter v. Innes (4 M. & Cr. 101), Gray v. Chiswell (9 Ves. 118); for every joint loan is in equity considered joint and several, Thorpe v. Jackson (3 Y. & C. (Ex.) 553). It is not necessary in proceeding against the assets of the deceased partner to prove that the surviving partner is insolvent. Wilkinson v. Henderson (1 Myl. & K. 582).

The testator, being a member at the time of the contract, became, by the 13th section, liable to the claimants, and his assets are still liable, after payment of his separate debts.

Again, the creditor's remedies are not limited to those given by the statute. The testator was a partner in this concern, and by the ordinary rules of this Court, independent of the statute, the claimants are entitled to come in under the decree and prove their debts. It was so held in Cowell v. Sikes (2 Russ. 191), decided by Lord Eldon on appeal. It has been held also, that a creditor of such joint stock bank has the usual remedies in bankruptcy, against the members, and may sue out a fiat against the individual members of the concern without proceeding against the public officer. (Exp. Wood, 1 M. D. & De G. 92, and 2 M. D. & De G. 282.)

[139] There being a decree for the administration of the estate, all the claims upon that estate must be ascertained and provided for, before the residuary legatees can be permitted to receive any portion of the assets. The Master must therefore take all the necessary accounts; and if the reference be not already sufficiently extensive, the Court will supply the defect of his authority; Paynter v. Housden (3 Mer. 297), Baker v. Martin (5 Sim. 380).

Mr. Pemberton Leigh, Mr. Turner, and Mr. G. L. Russell, for the Plaintiff; and

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Mylne, Mr. Teed and Mr. Bayley, for the Defendants, contra. The statute has created new rights for the benefit of the creditors of banking companies, and has subjected its members to new liabilities; in return it has imposed a limitation on the liability of the members, and required that those remedies alone which are thereby given, and no others, "shall" be pursued. The remedies given by the statute are in lieu and substitutional for the common law remedies, and not additional or cumulative; Steward v. Greaves (10 Mee. & W. 711). There, Baron Parke says, "We are all of opinion that the creditors of a company so established, and having a public officer, have no remedy against the individual members as at common law. And we are of this opinion upon the words of the ninth section, giving the remedy against the public officers, and upon the whole purview of the Act. The words of the section are, that 'all actions against the co-partnership shall, and lawfully may, be commenced, instituted, and prosecuted against one or more [140] of the public officers, nominated as before mentioned as the nominal Defendant.' These words, according to their ordinary import, are obligatory, and ought to have that construction, unless it would lead to some absurd or inconvenient consequence, or would be at variance with the intent of the Legislature, to be collected from other parts of the Act. But this construction is manifestly reasonable, and consistent with the context, and in accordance with the intent of the framers of the Act, to be collected from every part of it." And after shewing that the liability created by the statute was very different from that which existed independently of it, he says: "The framers of the Act had in view the convenience of the public, and thereby provided a more convenient remedy to creditors than at common law; but they had also in view the benefit of the members of the company, by restricting their personal liability." And his Lordship afterwards adds, "We are of opinion, therefore, that this Act of Parliament meant to give one remedy only, and that against the company in the name of its public officer."

A similar principle was acted on in the cases of The Dundalk Western Railway Company v. Tapster (1 Q. B. Rep. 670) and Harrison v. Timmins (4 Mee. & W. 510).

Under the provisions of this Act, the assets of the testator are in no way liable. First, because the executors and administrators of parties are not made liable by the Act; and, secondly, because the testator had ceased to be a member three years before any proceedings were taken by the claimants against the executors. Again, if there were any liability, then it is a secondary liability. The remedy must be obtained in the manner [141] pointed out by the thirteenth section, upon an application to the Court by motion, and by scire facias, Ransford v. Bosanquet (12 Adol. & E. 813); on which application it must be shewn that bond fide endeavours have been used to obtain an available execution against the persons who were members at the date of the judgment, and who are primarily liable (sect. 13); Eardley v. Law (12 Ad. & E. 802); Harwood v. Law (7 Mee. & W. 203).

Lastly, the tenth section provides that no claimant against the company shall bring more than one action or suit in respect of the same demand, and the former proceedings may be pleaded in bar. The present proceedings are quite inconsistent with this provision.

Mr. Bazalgette, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. This case is undoubtedly one of very great importance; and, considering the extent to which it may affect a great variety of transactions dependent upon this Act of Parliament, I cannot help feeling some regret both at the time and the mode in which it has been brought forward.

The decree in this cause was made in the simple and usual form, "to take an account of the debts, funeral expenses, and legacies of the testator." It is evident, therefore, that I have to consider what sort of claims can be established under such a decree, and I must have regard to the time when this matter was first brought forward. The parties being desirous to avoid a decision on any technical ground, I am willing, so far [142] as the facts of the case will allow, to state my opinion as if these claims under the decree had been brought forward in the most favourable form.

The question arises, first, upon the rights of these parties under the Act of Parliament, which has been so often referred to; and, secondly, upon any rights they may have independent of that Act. The Act was passed to relieve the public from certain restrictions imposed on bankers, in consequence of an agreement between Government and the Bank of England. It provided that persons who entered into banking partnerships might do various things previously prohibited, and, at the same time, it created a number of liabilities which did not previously exist. While it provided various facilities to creditors of banking companies, it subjected the persons engaged in them to various new liabilities, and also provided certain new regulations for enforcing them. These, in my opinion, were intended as an exoneration from those liabilities, to which, under other circumstances, the members would have been subject.

The first section provides, that every member shall be liable for all bills, &c., such person being a member at the date of the bills, or at the time of their being payable, or while owing or unpaid. So that any person, being a member, at any time between the date of the contract and the time when the debt arising therefrom is satisfied, is to become liable for its payment. A person might not be a party or liable to the contract: he might not be a member of the co-partnership at the time when proceedings were taken to enforce it, but by becoming a member at an intermediate period between the contract and the judgment, he would thereby render [143] himself liable to the payment. This is no small advantage given to the creditor of such a concern. It is a liability attaching to any person becoming a member at any time between the periods I have referred to.

In a subsequent part, this Act of Parliament proceeds to point out the mode in which satisfaction is to be obtained; and I can entertain no doubt (quite independently of the cases cited) that the remedies thus given, are for the satisfaction of liabilities previously created by the Act, and for no others. What then is the remedy provided for by this Act? Actions are to be brought against the registered "public officer;" when judgment has been obtained against him, it is to be considered as a judgment against the property of the partnership and all its members. How is the judgment to be executed? First, execution is to be had against any existing member. Nothing could be more just than that execution should go against those persons who are virtually parties to the proceedings upon which judgment has been obtained: their liability had been provided for before, although they might not have been parties to the contract, but might have become members afterwards, and be members at the time the proceedings took place which led to the judgment. These are the persons against whom execution is to issue in the first place. The Act then provides, that if this execution should be ineffectual for obtaining payment of the amount of the judgment, the Plaintiff may issue execution against any persons who were members at the time when the contract was entered into; secondly, against persons who became members at any time before such contract was executed; and thirdly, against persons who were members at the time the judgment was obtained, and this follows:—"Provided that no such execution as last mentioned shall be issued without leave first granted, on motion in open Court, by the [144] Court in which such judgment shall have been obtained, and when motion shall be made, on notice to the person or persons sought to be charged, nor after the expiration of three years next after any such person or persons shall have ceased to be a member or members of such corporation or co-partnership." This then is a clear limitation of three years, within which execution is to issue against such persons.

Let me apply this provision to the present case. The testator here necessarily ceased to be a member upon his death, in March 1839. The proceedings against the public officer, on which the judgments were obtained, were adopted sometime after his death. Now it has been admitted that execution could not, in any view, issue against the executors; they were not registered members, and the case was not provided for by the Act. Suppose then that this Act of Parliament affords an exclusive remedy in the cases only which are distinctly provided for, is a party, in a case not provided for by the Act, to be at liberty to resort to any other remedy which, under other circumstances, law or equity would afford? Law would afford him no remedy; that is perfectly clear, because the debt would survive. Would equity afford him a remedy? If it would, must it not govern itself by analogy to the limitation of time, at the expiration of which the legal liability would cease? There being perfectly new liabilities created by this Act of Parliament, and for which a specific remedy is provided, and there being a party living, against whom that remedy is to be enforced, would a Court of Equity, taking away entirely that protection which was intended to be afforded by the limitation of time, interfere, not for the purpose of relieving the creditor from the difficulty arising by reason of the death of the member of the concern, but in order to relieve him altogether from the limitation of time which [145] is distinctly provided by the Act of Parliament? I must say that I do not think it would.

It is very true, that at the time of Mr. Barker's death, he was subject to a liability; and it has very naturally been argued, that there being a liability, there must be some remedy by which the rights of the creditor may be made effectual and profitable. But what is that liability? It is a liability to have execution issued against him and his property before, but not after, the expiration of three years from the time the party ceased to be a member. That alone was this testator's liability. Notwithstanding the general words which are contained in the first clause of the Act, yet taking all the clauses together, looking at the means of making these liabilities effectual, and seeing that they were first created by this Act, we find this express limitation—that the liability is not to be enforced, by execution, after the expiration of three years from the time when the party shall have ceased to be a member of the co-partnership.

That being so, I do not see how I can grant any sort of relief, in a case in which the application is made to this Court long after the expiration of those three years. I do not mean to say anything as to the relief which might have been afforded, if a bill had been filed by these claimants within the three years; but this seems clear to me, that if, in such a case as this, relief is to be had in this Court against the assets of a deceased party, it must be sought before the legal liability under this Act would have expired, if the party had continued alive. In this state of the record, I do not think that any remedy can be given to the claimants in the present case.

I should state, that I think that a petition is the proper course of proceeding in a case like the present. [146] The matter does not come within the scope of the decree, and the Master, therefore, could not properly consider it.

The exceptions must be overruled, and the petition dismissed, and with costs.

[See Roots v. Snelling, 1883, 48 L. T. 218.]

Consideration of the effect, in equity, of misrepresentation made by parties upon entering into contracts.

Cases have frequently occurred, in which, upon entering into contracts, misrepresentations made by one party have not been, in any degree, relied on by the other party. If the party to whom the representations were made, himself resorted to the proper means of verification, before he entered into the contract, it may appear that he relied upon the result of his own investigation and inquiry, and not upon the representations made to him by the other party; or if the means of investigation and verification be at hand, and the attention of the party receiving the representations be drawn to them, the circumstances of the case may be such as to make it incumbent on a Court of Justice to impute to him a knowledge of the result, which, upon due inquiry, he ought to have obtained, and thus the notion of reliance on the representations made to him may be excluded.

Again, when the Court is endeavouring to ascertain what reliance was placed on representations, it must consider them with reference to the subject-matter, and the relative knowledge of the parties. If the subject is capable of being accurately known, and one party is, or is supposed to be, possessed of accurate knowledge, and the other is entirely ignorant, and a contract is entered into, after representations made by the party who knows, or is supposed to know, without any means of verification being resorted to by the other, it may well enough be presumed, that the ignorant man relied on the statements made by him who was supposed to be better informed; but if the subject is in its nature uncertain, if all that is known about it is matter of inference from something else, and if the parties making it, and receiving representations on the subject, have equal knowledge, and means of acquiring knowledge, and equal skill, it is not easy to presume that representations made by one would have much or any influence upon the other.

This was a motion for a new trial of an issue directed by the Court. The circumstances fully appear in the judgment.

Mr. Kindersley, Mr. Watson, and Mr. Wright, for the Defendant, in support of the motion.

[147] Mr. Turner, Mr. Knowles, and Mr. Elmsley, contra, for the Plaintiff.

Feb. 1. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The bill in this cause was filed for the purpose of compelling the Defendant specifically to perform an agreement which he had entered into, to take from the Plaintiff a lease of certain coal mines.

On the hearing of the cause, two issues were directed to be tried: 1. Whether, during the treaty for the agreement, any false representations, on which the Defendant relied, were made by the Plaintiff or his agent, to the Defendant or his agent, in respect to the mines or property comprised in the agreement; 2. Whether the Defendant signed the memorandum at the foot of the draft lease under any false representations of the Plaintiff or his solicitor, made to the Defendant or his solicitor, in respect of the contents of the same draft lease, or any alterations made therein.

The Plaintiff in this cause was also Plaintiff in the issues, and on the trial a verdict was found for the Plaintiff on both issues.

The Defendant, now, acquiescing in the verdict found on the second issue, has moved for a new trial on the first.

The coal comprised in the lease comprised beds of coal distinguished by the names of the Adwalton coal, the Middleton deep coal, and the Middleton little coal.

[148] In answer to questions put by the learned Judge before whom the issues were tried, the jury stated, that the Plaintiff did not make any false representation to the Defendant or his agent, as to the quantity of the Adwalton coal remaining to be gotten; and that the Plaintiff did make false representations to the Defendant, as to the depth of the Middleton deep coal from the surface, and as to the thickness of the Middleton little coal, but that Shillito or his agent did not rely on any such false representations.

The Defendant alleges, that the opinion expressed by the jury that the Plaintiff did not make any false representation as to the quantity of the Adwalton coal remaining to be gotten, is against the evidence which was produced on the trial; and that the opinion expressed by the jury, that the Defendant or his agent did not rely on any false representations as to the Middleton coal, is erroneous, and arose from some want of sufficient explanation of the meaning of the term reliance, which might have been, but was not, afforded by the Judge.

Having carefully read the Judge's notes and the evidence in the cause, and considered the arguments of counsel, I am of opinion that there is no reason to disturb the verdict, on the ground, that the opinion of the jury respecting the quantity of coal remaining to be gotten in the Adwalton mine was against the evidence produced. It was, indeed, against the testimony of Field, but having regard to the other evidence in the case, and the means which the trial afforded of testing the credibility of Field, I see no reason to think, that the jury came to an erroneous conclusion on that point.

Upon the other point, it appears to me that there is more difficulty. The jury were of opinion, that false [149] misrepresentations were made respecting the Middleton coal during the treaty for the agreement; and if we suppose that conclusion to be correct, it requires, at least, some consideration and explanation to shew, that representations, found to be false, had not some influence on the Defendant when he entered into the agreement.

Cases have frequently occurred, in which, upon entering into contracts, misrepresentations made by one party have not been, in any degree, relied on by the other party. If the party to whom the representations were made himself resorted to the proper means of verification, before he entered into the contract, it may appear, that he relied upon the result of his own investigation and inquiry, and not upon the representations made to him by the other party: or if the means of investigation and verification be at hand, and the attention of the party receiving the representations be drawn to them, the circumstances of the case may be such, as to make it incumbent on a Court of Justice to impute to him a knowledge of the result, which, upon due inquiry, he ought to have obtained, and thus the notion of reliance on the representations made to him may be excluded.

Again, when we are endeavouring to ascertain what reliance was placed on representations, we must consider them with reference to the subject-matter, and the relative knowledge of the parties. If the subject is capable of being accurately known, and one party is, or is supposed to be, possessed of accurate knowledge, and the other is entirely ignorant, and a contract is entered into, after representations made by the party who knows, or is supposed to know, without any means of verification being resorted to by the other, it may well enough be [150] presumed, that the ignorant man relied on the statements made by him who was supposed to be better informed; but if the subject is in its nature uncertain—if all that is known about it is matter of inference from something else, and if the parties making and receiving representations on the subject have equal knowledge, and means of acquiring knowledge, and equal skill, it is not easy to presume, that representations made by one would have much or any influence upon the other.

Cases vary infinitely in their circumstances, and it is, I think, obvious, that a very great variety of circumstances may occur, in which it may appear that a contract was entered into after erroneous representations made by one party, and yet without the other party having at all relied on those erroneous representations.

In the present case, it may be that the jury has correctly found, that the representations made to the Defendant respecting the Middleton coal were false, and not relied on by the Defendant.

It does not appear that the closes of land containing the coal in question had been bored, for the purpose of ascertaining what were the depth and thickness of the Middleton coal. The depth and thickness, at some distance, were known, but there were variations in the beds, and all that was known afforded only obscure and uncertain indications of the depth and thickness of the beds in particular closes, which had not been bored to the requisite depth.

Having regard to the nature of the subject, to the language of the witnesses, and to the experience of the Defendant's agent, to whom the representations were made, I cannot, upon the mere statement of the evidence to me, avoid entertaining some doubt, whether the representations made to Field were such as can properly be called false; and having carefully read, not only the notes of the evidence taken at the trial, but also all the evidence taken in this suit, and being without the benefit of any personal observation upon the witnesses under examination at the trial, I do not see any sufficient reason for thinking that the jury came to an improper conclusion.

In that state of circumstances, I have anxiously considered what was said at the Bar, respecting the summing up of the learned Judge, and I am satisfied that the proper questions were fairly and sufficiently brought under the consideration of the jury. It is not alleged that any additional evidence can be adduced; and it appears to me, that in a matter, which in itself may have been somewhat doubtful—in which I have myself some doubt upon the finding as to false representations, and in which I agree with the finding as to the non-reliance of the Defendant upon false representations (supposing them to have been made), I ought to be satisfied with the verdict upon the first issue.

I therefore refuse the motion for a new trial. The costs of the motion must be considered at the hearing on the equity reserved.

Feb. 16. The cause came on for further directions, when specific performance was decreed, with the costs of suit, of the issues, and of the application for a new trial.

[152] UPJOHN v. UPJOHN. Feb. 15, 1844.

Bequest of residue to A. for life, with power thereout to advance her eldest son, and a gift, after A.'s death, of the said residue to A.'s children equally. Held, on the context, that the amount advanced to A.'s eldest son was not to be taken into account in the ultimate division of the remainder amongst A.'s children.

The testatrix gave and devised "all the residue of her estate" to her executors, in trust to invest, and to pay the interest to her daughter Catherine Mary Page for life. She then proceeded in the following words:—"And I do hereby empower my said executors and executrix, during the lifetime of my said daughter (her consent in writing first obtained), to employ and expend any part of the said residue, they, in their discretion, shall think meet, towards the support, education, and advancement in life of my grandson William George Page. And from and after the death of my said daughter, I give the said residue to all the children of my said daughter now born or hereafter to be born, by her present or any future husband, to be equally divided between them, share and share alike, and to be severally paid them as they shall respectively attain the age of twenty-one years; the share or shares of such as shall die under that age to be equally divided between the survivors. But if none of them shall attain the said age of twenty-one years, then I give the said residue to my nephew William Burlton."

The executors of the will, with the consent of Catherine Mary Upjohn, and by virtue of the power given by the will, "advanced to and for the benefit of William George Page the sum of £300."

[153] The question which now came before the Court was, whether, in the ultimate division of the residue, this sum of £300 was to be deducted from William George Page's share.

Mr. Prescott White, and Mr. Campbell, argued as follows:—The £300 ought not to be deducted from the share of William George Page.

The power to employ any portion of the residue towards the support, education, and advancement in life of William George Page, does not mean a power of prepayment out of his share, but a benefit, beyond that given to the other children, of promoting or establishing him in the world.

The usual clauses in settlements contain the hotchpot clause, or a direction that the money advanced shall be taken "as part of the provision thereby provided." (Sanders on Uses, 172.) Here there is no such clause. This gift also differs from the ordinary clause of advancement contained in a settlement, in several respects. First, here the power precedes the gift. Secondly, it applies to one child only, and not to all. Thirdly, it is to be executed only during the life of the tenant for life, and not afterwards, though the legatee be then a minor. And fourthly, it empowers the executors to raise any part of the whole residue, and is not limited to the presumptive share of the eldest son.

The testatrix intending a preference in favour of William George Page, gave a power of appointing any part of the whole fund to him. The power has been exercised, and the appointee takes as if the ap-[154]-pointment had been contained in the will itself, and he is entitled to his full share of the unappointed residue.

Mr. Glasse, Mr. Parry, and Mr. Bagshawe, contra. The testatrix clearly intended an equality amongst all the children. The residue was to be divided, "share and share alike," and it is to be remarked she uses the word "said residue," viz., the whole residue previously mentioned, before any deduction.

The only way of arriving at an equality, is by attributing the £300 to the share of William George Page in the residue.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] (without hearing a reply). The testatrix did not mean an equality, for, there being a plurality of children, she, for some reason, which we can only conjecture, gave to the eldest a benefit which she did not extend to the other children.

Having given "all her residue," the whole was to remain in mass, and the interest was to be paid to her daughter for life; but there was a power, with the daughter's consent, to employ and expend "any part of the said residue" (that is, of the residue in mass), towards the support, &c., of her eldest son, and on her death, "the said residue" was to be divided among the children.

By the last words, "the said residue," she could not have meant the whole of her residue, excluding the money which might have been advanced, because the gift over is in the same terms, namely, of "her said [155] residue," which must evidently have meant her residue after such deduction.

It appears to me that a benefit was given to the eldest beyond the other children, and the £300 ought not therefore to be deducted from his share.

[155] GILL v. EYTON. Dec. 8, 1843.

After a bill for redemption had been filed, but before the subpoena had been served, the mortgagee transferred his mortgage, and his transferee was brought before the Court by supplemental bill. It was alleged that the transfer had been made for fraudulent and vexatious purposes. Held, that the Plaintiff was not entitled to the production of the deed of transfer.

This was a motion for the production of papers.

The Plaintiff Gill filed his original bill against one Danily for the redemption of a mortgage; and pending the suit, but before service of the subpoena, Danily assigned his mortgage to Eyton. The Plaintiff thereupon brought Eyton before the Court by a supplemental bill. It was alleged that the assignment was fraudulent and vexatious, and in order to impede the Plaintiff in the enforcement of his rights. The Defendant Eyton admitted that he had the assignment in his possession, and the question now was, whether he was bound to produce it.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh, for the Plaintiff. We allege that this was a fraudulent and vexatious contrivance, in order to defeat the rights of the Plaintiff; and it is settled, that where a deed is impeached for fraud, a Plaintiff is entitled to its production. (See Bassford v. Blakesley, 6 Beav. 131.)

[156] Mr. Kindersley, contrà.

A mortgagee is not bound to produce his deeds until payment of what is due to him. This suit does not impeach the assignment for fraud, but seeks to redeem; and the allegations as to the assignment are only introduced with a view to the costs of the suit.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. As to the production of this deed, it is to be observed, that this bill does not impeach it for fraud, for the Plaintiff is willing to pay what is due upon the mortgage. It is, however, alleged, that the assignment was fraudulent and vexatious, because it was executed in order to hamper the Plaintiff in recovering back the mortgage property. I think this no sufficient reason why it should be ordered to be produced.

[157] ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. THE LEATHER SELLERS' COMPANY.

[See In re Freston, 1883, 11 Q. B. D. 555.]

A solicitor who is proceeding to Court to attend his professional business there pending, is privileged from arrest.

A solicitor, on an application for his discharge, swore, that at the time of the caption he was proceeding direct from his dwelling-house for the purpose of attending the hearing of two petitions at Westminster. On the other hand, two witnesses deposed, that the direction in which he was walking was not the direction they would have proceeded as the nearest and most direct way to Westminster. Held, that this was not a sufficient proof of deviation, so as to disentitle the solicitor to his discharge.

In this case an attachment had issued against J. T., the solicitor in the cause, for non-delivery of his bill of costs, pursuant to an order to that effect. He was arrested thereunder on the 12th of January.

It was now moved that he might be discharged out of custody, on the ground that, at the time of his arrest, he was proceeding to attend a case in the Rolls Court in which he was engaged as solicitor. His affidavit stated, that at the time of the arrest, he was proceeding direct from his own dwelling-house in Wharton Street, Pentonville, for the express purpose of attending this Court, to be present at the hearing of two petitions standing in the paper.

J. T.'s clerk stated, that he left J. T., at his dwelling-house, at or very shortly before eleven o'clock of the same day, with the papers to be used on the hearing of the petitions, he being instructed and informed by J. T. to call at his chambers in Gray's Inn, and that the said J. T. should leave his said dwelling-house in a quarter of an hour, and go direct to Westminster, and would meet the deponent on his road to Westminster, and take the said papers, as he, J. T., must be at Westminster before twelve o'clock, by which time he expected the petitions to come on, and when he had appointed to meet some of the other solicitors in the said cause at Westminster.

[158] On the other hand, the officer and another witness stated, that he arrested J. T. in Bagnigge Wells Road, when J. T. stated, that he had a cause at Westminster, and was then on his way to attend it, but he did not name the Court in which such cause was to be heard, nor did he shew any papers confirmatory of this statement; that he on the contrary, and in the same breath, stated, that he had an appointment at Judges' Chambers, and after that another appointment in Lincoln's Inn Fields. That when he, the officer, arrested J. T. in the Bagnigge Wells Road, he was walking towards Coppice Row, Clerkenwell, which is not the direction in which the deponents, if they resided in Wharton Street, Pentonville, would have proceeded to Westminster, as the nearest and most direct way to such last-mentioned place.

Mr. C. P. Cooper now moved that J. T. might be discharged out of custody, on the ground that he was privileged from arrest, while proceeding to attend to his professional duties in this Court.

Mr. John Baily, contrà, contended that the party was not entitled to his discharge; that he had deviated from the direct road to the Court, and was, in fact, proceeding to other places before coming to Westminster.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The only question is, whether Mr. J. T. is entitled to his protection from arrest.

No doubt a solicitor, who is proceeding to Court to attend to his professional business there pending, is privileged from arrest; and the question always is, whether, at the time of the arrest, he was bona fide pro-[159]-ceeding in a direct line to or from the Court. Here, he states positively, that he was proceeding direct from his residence towards Westminster Hall, for the express purpose of attending the hearing of two petitions in the paper, and he is corroborated in this by another person, who states other collateral circumstances.

I think this would clearly be sufficient to entitle him to his privilege; but a doubt is thrown on the matter, by his not having given a distinct account to the officer of where he was proceeding: it is, however, very possible that he might have been flurried at the time, and that he might have intended to go to the several places, first to the Court, and afterwards to the others; this would not be quite inconsistent with what he stated.

With regard to his proceeding in a direct line, the officer says that he would not have proceeded in this direction, as the nearest and most direct way to Westminster; but he might be better acquainted with the way, and might have known a nearer road; and he has not stated that this was not the way by which persons ordinarily go from Wharton Street to Westminster.

I think that, on the affidavits before me, this party is entitled to his discharge. (See Ex parte Ledwich, 8 Ves. 598; Gascoygne's case, 14 Ves. 183; Castle's case, 16 Ves. 412; Ex parte Byrne, 1 Ves. & B. 317.)

[160] THE MARQUIS OF HERTFORD v. SUISSE. Feb. 8, 1844.

A motion to dismiss being made, the Vice-Chancellor ordered it to stand over till the Lord Chancellor had decided on appeal a motion relating to the subject. After the Lord Chancellor's decision, the Plaintiff, suppressing what had taken place before the Vice-Chancellor, obtained, at the Rolls, an order of course to amend. It was held irregular, and discharged with costs.

The bill in this cause was filed on the 12th of July 1842, against Suisse and other Defendants. The answer of Suisse was filed on the 17th of November 1842.

On the 8th of May 1843 Suisse moved, before the Vice-Chancellor of England, to dismiss the bill for want of prosecution, but an appeal motion being then pending before the Lord Chancellor, which related to the matters of the cause, the Vice-Chancellor of England ordered the application to dismiss to stand over, until the Lord Chancellor had given judgment on the motion.

On the 18th of November 1843 the Lord Chancellor gave judgment (1 Phillips, 207), and on the 25th of January 1844 the Plaintiff, upon petition of course, obtained at the Rolls an order to amend his bill. The Plaintiff, in his petition, made no mention of the pendency of the motion to dismiss, or of what had taken place before the Vice-Chancellor of England on that motion.

Mr. Roupell and Mr. De Gex now moved to discharge the order to amend. They argued, that it was irregular, first, on the merits (which it is unnecessary to state, as the judgment was founded on the irregularity); secondly, because it had been obtained while the motion to dismiss was pending, and by a suppression of those material circumstances which had occurred before the Vice-Chancellor.

[161] Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Schomberg, contra, argued that the order was regular on the merits, that there was no suppression of any facts which were material; and that an order to amend was regular, if obtained before judgment given on the motion to dismiss.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS was of opinion that the order was irregular, having been irregularly obtained, as of course, upon a suppression of material facts. (See 6th Order of 9th May 1839, Ordines Can. 137.) He said that he could not determine the merits, as the cause was attached to the other branch of the Court. He discharged the order with costs. (See Robinson v. Milner, 5 Beav. 49; Hooper v. Paver, 6 Beav. 173; St. Victor v. Devereux, 6 Beav. 584.)

[161] BOWMAN v. BELL. Feb. 10, 1845.

On an issue devisavit vel non, the jury found in favour of the will, but before the cause had been heard on the equity reserved, the devisees in trust applied for a reference, to inquire whether a contract entered into by them was beneficial. Held, that the application was premature.

A testator devised his estate to trustees, who contracted to sell the property. This suit being afterwards instituted, the heir disputed the will. An issue devisavit vel non was directed, the accounts of the personal estate were ordered to be taken, and further directions were reserved.

The jury found in favour of the will. The trustees, before the case had been brought on upon the equity reserved, presented a petition for a reference to the Master to ascertain if it would be beneficial to the parties to adopt the sale.

Mr. Kindersley, Mr. Purvis, and Mr. Shee, for different parties.

[162] THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] thought the application premature, and that this petition could not be heard till the case had been disposed of on the equity reserved. He said that the issue having been directed merely to inform the conscience of the Court, the validity of the will had not yet been finally established so as to enable the Court at present to act upon it.

[162] CLARKE v. MANNING. Feb. 24, 1844.

This Court has concurrent jurisdiction with Courts of law in cases of fraud, but there are courses of conduct which this Court construes as fraudulent, but which Courts of law would not notice.

Upon an injunction to restrain an action at law, on the ground both of legal and equitable fraud, the Court, admitting its jurisdiction to determine the legal fraud, permitted the action to proceed, in order to determine the question of legal fraud, and restrained execution only, with liberty to apply. The jury having found that there was no legal fraud, this Court afterwards entered into the consideration of the question of equitable fraud, and finding none to exist, permitted execution to be taken out.

This was a motion for an injunction to restrain proceedings at law, and was founded on the merits confessed by the Defendant's answer.

It appeared that in 1842 Roe and Blachford carried on business in the Isle of Wight as bankers, and that they had in their hands monies, to a considerable amount, belonging jointly to the Defendant Manning and others, who were their customers. A joint stock bank being about to be formed, it was agreed that the business of Roe & Blachford should cease, that the banking company should be carried on upon the same premises, and that Roe and Blachford should become two of the managing directors of the banking company.

The company accordingly commenced business on the 12th of May 1842. Manning, some time afterwards, opened an account with the new banking company, and [163] Blachford, acting for the company, fraudulently transferred the balance of £1977, due to Manning from himself and Roe, from the account of the old firm to that of the new; and, on behalf of the bank, rendered them liable to Manning for the payment. The amount was entered in the "pass-book," but was omitted in the other books of the company. A correspondence which took place between Manning and the company, acting by Blachford, was in like manner suppressed.

In December 1842 Blachford and Roe became bankrupts, the fraud became known, and the question was, who was to suffer by it. Manning commenced an action at law against the banking company for the recovery of the balance due, including the £1977, and the bank, submitting to the remainder of the claim, filed this bill to be relieved from the payment of the £1977, and charging Manning with fraud and collusion in the matter.

An answer was put in, denying all the charges of fraud particularly set out in the bill. A motion was now made for an injunction. The other facts of this case are stated in the judgment of the Court.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Bagshawe, in support of the motion.

Mr. Turner and Mr. Allnutt, contra.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The Plaintiff in this case is the managing officer of the Isle of Wight Joint Stock Banking Company. The bill is filed by him for the purpose of restraining the Defendants from pro-[164]-ceeding at law to recover a debt alleged to be due to them from the banking company.

The circumstances of this case are singular. In the month of May 1842 two persons of the name of Roe and Blachford carried on the business of bankers at Newport in the Isle of Wight. At that time, the formation of the Isle of Wight Joint Stock Banking Company was in contemplation, and arrangements were made between Roe and Blachford and the persons forming the new company, by which the business of Roe & Blachford, as bankers, was to cease, their business was to be wound up in a place in the neighbourhood, and their former place of business was to be occupied as the banking shop of the Joint Stock Banking Company then in formation. The deed of settlement was executed on the 9th of May 1842, and the business commenced on the 12th of May. The directors who were appointed to superintend the business were four persons, of whom Roe and Blachford, partners in the old firm, were to be the managing directors—an arrangement, the prudence of which certainly seems (to say the least of it) very questionable. They accordingly undertook to be the managing directors. Roe and Blachford were debtors to the Defendants, in this cause on two separate accounts. On one account they were debtors to the amount of £463, 14s. 6d., and on the other for the sum of £1877, 18s. Some variations took place in one of these accounts before the month of August 1842, when, on one account, £463, 14s. 6d. was due from Roe and Blachford, and on the other £1467, 12s. 1d. There was some interest due, and the whole sum then due for principal and interest amounted to £1977, which is the only sum now in question between the parties.

[165] In the same month of August, the Defendants were desirous that the balance due to them from the old firm, should be transferred to the account of the new firm, the Joint Stock Banking Company, and on the 11th of August a letter was written by Mr. Blachford to the Defendants, stating that they were at liberty to draw on the new firm to the amount of £1467, 12s. 1d., the balance due upon one of the two accounts. On the 15th of August a cheque was drawn by the Defendants upon the new firm, for the sum of £1000, in favour of Mr. Deacon, the solicitor of the Defendants. Mr. Deacon paid it into the hands of his bankers, his bankers communicated with the Joint Stock Bank, but when it was paid, does not appear. Another cheque, for a sum of £1000, was also drawn on the 29th of August by the Defendants in favour of Mr. Deacon, and which was treated in the same manner. When that was paid, does not appear.

I think it does appear, on this occasion, that when these two cheques were drawn, there was no account open between the new firm and the Defendants, but it seems, that on the 5th of September, Mr. Blachford, the managing director, gave instructions to the clerk of the new firm, to open an account between the new firm and the Defendants; and we find entries made, beginning on a day in September which is not stated, in which those two checks of £1000 each, together with other sums, are duly entered. The first entry on the other side of the account is dated on the 23d of September, and consisted of a sum then paid into the new bank by the Defendants, and some other sums were also entered. On the 30th of September there is one of cash entered as £55, 10s., paid in by the Defendants to the new bank, and immediately under that entry, and seemingly on the same day, there is an entry to the [166] credit of the Defendants of £1977, being the sum which is now in question between these parties, and stated to be the amount of the whole balance due to the Defendants from Roe and Blachford. It is thus entered, on the 30th September, to the credit of the Defendants with the new firm, in the pass-book between the new firm and the Defendants; but as it seems at present, entered nowhere else, and not at all entered in any of the general open books of the partnership, which books, though they comprise the entries of the other sums of money comprised in this "pass-book," do not contain any entry whatever of this particular sum. The account, as kept in the pass-book, goes on with this item of £1977, but as kept in the other books of the firm, without that item. The pass-book is, from time to time, made up with that item. Whether there was any making up of the accounts in the other books, does not appear on this occasion; but this item was not in them, as it would seem. The matter so proceeds, and the account goes on between the parties. Roe and Blachford became bankrupts in December 1842. The pass-book is then communicated to the persons who at that time had the management of the business, and it is discovered that the accounts in the pass-book, and in the other books of the firm differ in respect of this item. It became plain a fraud must have been committed, and a very gross fraud. Who is to bear the burthen of it? That is really the only question between these parties. The fraud, which up to that time was secret, having been exposed, immediately, and of necessity, arises the question between these parties, "who is to be charged with the effect of it?" The Joint Stock Banking Company, who are the Plaintiffs in this cause, say, they are advised, that, under the circumstances, they ought not to bear it. The Defendants say they have acted in the usual way between bankers and their customers; that [167] they were justified in trusting the persons with whom they dealt, who acted on behalf of the company; that they are perfectly and entirely innocent, and therefore ought not to be charged with the consequences of this fraud.

In that state of things the Defendants commence their action, for the purpose of recovering what appears to be due on the balance of their account, including in it this disputed item of £1977. The Defendants in the action, represented by the Plaintiffs in this cause, say, you are not entitled to so large a sum as that; we must deduct the £1977, the subject of this fraud, and we will pay into Court the remaining part of the balance. They did pay that into Court. The Plaintiffs in the action have accepted that sum, and it now appears that the remaining sum is, as I stated before, the only one in question.

This bill is filed, stating these and some other facts which I have not thought it necessary minutely to detail; and, in stating those facts, it, at the same time, charges the Defendants with having concerted a fraud with Blachford, or with Blachford and Roe, for the purpose of obtaining payment of this balance from the new firm, which it was hopeless they would be able to obtain from Roe and Blachford, and, on that ground of fraud, thus charged, it asks for relief. The charges in the bill are those of fraud, by concert and combination between these parties. The case is brought into equity, not only on the ground of fraud, but also on the ground of complication of account; that, however, I do not particularly take notice of.

This Court has clearly a concurrent jurisdiction with all other Courts in matters of fraud; but the defence [168] which is made is this—that all the frauds which are here distinctly charged as such, that if the Plaintiffs were to make them out, they would furnish a defence at law, and therefore the Plaintiffs have no occasion to seek relief in equity. The Defendants here say, let the action be tried, you have pleaded the frauds, prove them, and you will have there the same relief which you ask for here. The answer to which is this: It is very true, that if I make out those frauds which would be a defence at law, I should succeed at law; and, though I have not distinctly charged fraud of any other kind, yet I have stated and alleged facts, which shew that there has been a fraud which would not be a defence at law, not being those direct frauds arising from falsehood, concert, and combination, which will be taken notice of there, but frauds which will only be taken cognizance of in a Court of Equity, namely, fraud arising from the negligence or want of caution of the parties dealing with the agents, directors or managers of the Joint Stock Company—such negligence and such want of caution as have enabled them to practise a fraud on those for whom they were acting, and which they would not have been able to have practised, if the Defendants here had not been guilty of such want of attention and such negligence as they have.

It is very true that there are courses of conduct which this Court construes to be fraudulent, and which may be used as a defence to a party sought to be charged with the consequence of them, which would not be taken notice of in a Court of law. It is very true also that those matters which have been called legal frauds might be taken notice of here; but relief is sought for on the ground of both species of fraud, namely, that which would be considered fraud in a Court of law, and that which would be held to be fraud in a Court [169] of Equity. The answer comes in, denying directly and positively all the charges of fraud which are particularly set out in the bill, and claims and insists, that the Defendants have a right to have those imputed frauds determined by an immediate investigation in a Court of law. They, however, admit that there may possibly be such things as this Court alone would consider a defence to their claim, but not admitting that anything of the sort exists.

This being a motion made upon the answer, which denies all direct or legal fraud, the order which I have to make on this present occasion cannot proceed, in the last degree, on that foundation. The question which I have to consider here is, whether there is not a probable case to be made out which requires investigation; and I think that this is a case that requires investigation as to that which is alleged to be a fraud in a Court of Equity. Then it is said by the Plaintiffs that the legal and equitable fraud are but one case, and that I must determine both together. It is certainly one case, but it is founded on two distinct portions—namely, the charges of direct fraud, and the charges of fraud which, though not direct and being innocently meant, might nevertheless relieve the party who is sought to be charged with the effect of it. Is it an imperative rule that I must have the whole tried at once? Where direct frauds are charged, I think they are much more likely to be fully investigated in a Court of law than here. Why, then, should not this Court relieve itself of that portion of the case which can be best determined in a Court of law? Why should not that part of this matter, which is capable of being better tried and determined in a Court of law, be there disposed of, reserving to the parties the benefit they may be exclusively entitled to in a Court of Equity? It comes, therefore, [170] to this, whether there might not be an injunction to stay execution, without staying the trial; and I think that this will be the most convenient mode of disposing of the matter.

The importance of trying the matter in this way is quite apparent. Suppose that, in the action, this legal fraud should be made out, then there would be an end of all the Plaintiff's claim—there would be an end of the necessity for this bill. On the other hand, suppose there was to be a verdict against these charges of direct fraud, and that the Plaintiff in this cause was satisfied, after the evidence which had been produced, that these charges of fraud, which are so distinctly denied by this answer, could never be substantiated, would it not then be quite open to him to amend his bill, by striking out of it all those charges of direct fraud, and relying on those charges or those facts which tend to shew, as against these Defendants, that there has been that which has been called equitable fraud? Why is this suit to go on with such a complicated state of charges, when, even after the imperfect examination of evidence which we can have here, the result might very probably be to send the matter to a Court of law, and when, in this stage of the cause and action, those questions of direct fraud might, at once, be brought to a satisfactory conclusion?

I am disposed to permit this action to go on to a trial, and, if necessary, to make an order that there shall be no execution taken out upon it, or to take the undertaking of these parties, as I have done before, that they will not do anything upon it, either without the leave of this Court, or giving to the Plaintiff an opportunity of applying to the Court. There may have been such a course of conduct between these parties, that the Plaintiffs at law, though they obtain a verdict, may still [171] be restrained in this Court from enforcing it. I think, therefore, that I must allow the action to proceed in order that the matter may be tried; but I must not allow execution to be taken out until that verdict can be further considered here.

NOTE.—The Defendant at law pleaded fraud, covin, misrepresentation and collusion with other persons, but, on the trial of the action, the issues were found for the Plaintiffs. On the 6th of June 1844 a motion was made for liberty to proceed on the judgment, which, after full discussion of the circumstances of alleged equitable fraud, the Court granted.

[171] DAVIS v. BARRETT. Feb. 26, 1844.

A notice of motion and affidavit in support professed, in its title, to give the names of all the parties, but omitted one. The Court would not proceed, but gave leave to amend, and re-swear.

Mr. Burge, Mr. G. Turner and Mr. Hoare, were proceeding to open a motion in this case, when,

Mr. Kindersley objected, that the notice of motion and affidavit in support of it, which professed in its title to give the names of all of the Defendants, omitted the name of John Graham Clarke. He insisted that the motion could not therefore proceed.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS said the strict rule was, that there ought to be a correct title to the heading. He would not hear the motion, but would give leave to amend the notice of motion, and to re-swear the affidavit.

By deed, £10,000 was settled on A. B. for life, with power to appoint to her children or their issue, and in default in trust for her children; power was also given to A. B. to appoint a life interest to her husband. Afterwards, by will, the settlor gave a similar sum "to be laid out for the sole benefit of C. D., in the same manner, as nearly as might be, as the £10,000" secured for A. B. by the deed. Held, that C. D. was entitled to powers of appointment in favour of her children, their issue, and her husband; but that the children took nothing, except through the power.

The testator, by a codicil dated the 10th of January 1834, gave as follows:—"I give to Lord Lowther, Sir Edmund Antrobus, Bart., and Edward Marjoribanks, Esq.,

£10,000 over and above the legacy tax, in trust to be laid out for the sole benefit of my ward Matilda, now Countess of Bercholdt, in the same manner, as nearly as may be, as the £10,000 I have secured on my Birmingham property for Charlotte Leopoldina Strachan (Countess Zichy Ferraris). Naples, 10th January 1834. This is meant over and above other legacies. August 1st, 1834."

The £10,000 referred to in the codicil was secured on the Birmingham estate in the following manner:—

By indenture, dated the 19th of October 1833, and made between the testator of the one part, and trustees of the other part, reciting that the testator had determined and agreed to make such provision for the Countess Zichy de Ferraris (then Miss Strachan) and her issue, and failing them, for her sister, the Princess of St. Antimo and her issue, as was thereafter mentioned, the testator granted to the trustees a perpetual rent charge of £400 a year, issuing out of his Birmingham property, upon trust, for the Countess Zichy de Ferraris, for her separate use for life; and after her decease, in trust for such of her children, or the issue of her children as she should appoint, and in default, in trust for her children equally. And in case of there being no child, or of their dying under 21 without leaving lawful issue living at their decease, then there [173] was a gift to the Princess of St. Antimo and her children and their issue similar to the preceding, with an ultimate limitation in favour of the settlor.

The deed contained a power for the Countess Zichy de Ferraris and the Princess St. Antimo to appoint all or any part of the £400 a year to any husband for life, to take effect on her death, and to precede the trust for her children.

The deed contained a power for the owner of the estate to exonerate it by payment of £10,000. The sum was to be invested in land, and was to be conveyed upon the same trusts, and with, under, and subject to the same powers, provisions, &c., as those declared respecting the £400 a year.

This bill was filed to have the trusts of the legacy declared.

Mr. Burge and Mr. Tripp, for the Plaintiff, contended that the Plaintiff was entitled for her separate use for life, with power to appoint to her children, and their issue, and to her husband, in the same way as was directed in favour of the Countess Zichy de Ferraris by the deed. They argued that these powers formed part of the benefits intended by the testator. (Phipson v. Turner, 9 Sim. 246.)

Mr. Gordon, for the children of the Plaintiff, argued that the Plaintiff had the power of appointing the fund to them.

Mr. Simpson, for the Plaintiff's husband, contended, either that the Plaintiff took the fund absolutely, or with the several powers of appointment.

[174] Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Schomberg, for the Marquis of Hertford. The Plaintiff takes a life interest only, and subject thereto, the marquis, as residuary legatee, is absolutely entitled to the fund. The legacy is to be laid out "for the sole benefit" of the Plaintiff: this excludes the notion that any other party is to take a benefit. It does not, in any way, appear, that the husband or children were objects of the testator's bounty.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. By the deed of 1833, the owner of the estate had the power of redeeming the charge of £400 a year, on payment of £10,000; and this sum was to be laid out on lands to be settled to the same uses, and with the same powers, &c., as the rent charge. It has been admitted, throughout the argument, that this redemption money is the sum referred to in the codicil by the description of the £10,000 "secured on my Birmingham property."

If the rent charge had been redeemed, and the £10,000 thus secured, had been laid out as directed, what interest would the Countess Zichy de Ferraris have taken? She would have had a life interest, with a power to appoint to her children or their issue, and a power to give a life interest to her husband. In default of her appointing, there would also have been a distinct independent gift to her children in conformity with the recital in the deed, of the settlor's intention to make a provision for her "and her issue." In the codicil nothing is said as to the children, but the legacy is to be laid out for the sole benefit of the Countess Bercholdt, in the same manner, as nearly as may be, as the £10,000 secured on the Birmingham property. Great stress has been laid on the word "sole;" and it has been argued, that because the legacy is to be settled for the legatee's "sole [175] benefit," therefore any construction by means of which a beneficial interest may be taken by any other person must be excluded. No doubt the word "sole" must have its full effect and operation; but I am of opinion that the effect of that word is not such as is contended for by the Defendant. The £10,000 is to be laid out for the "sole benefit" of the Plaintiff, but "in the same manner," as nearly as may be, as the other £10,000 secured on the Birmingham property. How was that settled for the benefit of the Plaintiff? She had a life interest with these powers. A life interest is surely improved by the addition of a power to appoint to a husband and children.

I admit that there is no gift to the children, except through the power; but I am of opinion that the Plaintiff, in addition to her life interest, is entitled to a power of appointment over this legacy, in favour of her husband and children or their issue, with an ultimate limitation, in default of appointment, to the representatives of the settlor. I must declare so accordingly.

The costs must be paid out of the testator's estate.

[176] THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. THE CORPORATION OF LEICESTER.

Feb. 17, 19, 1844.

An agent assisting in a breach of trust is personally responsible.

A municipal corporation were trustees of a charity. They permitted their town clerk to receive and retain the trust monies, instead of seeing it applied to the purposes of the trust. Held, that the corporation and the town clerk were liable for the breach of trust.

In a suit to remedy a breach of trust, it is not, since the New Orders, necessary to make every party participating in the breach of trust party to the suit.

This was an ex officio charity information filed by the Attorney-General against the Corporation of Leicester, Mr. Burbidge, their former town clerk, and against the present trustees of one of the charities in question.

It appeared that Sir Thomas White, Robert Heyrick, and John Parker had, many years back, made several benefactions to the Corporation of Leicester, upon certain charitable trusts, by which they were, in effect, to employ the income in making loans to young men, repayable without interest, and, on repayment, the same sums were to be lent out again in a similar manner. The Corporation had, accordingly, for a considerable period, lent out these monies on bond; and it had been the practice for the outgoing mayor to hand over the balance of the funds to his successor, together with the securities; but for some years previous to the passing of the Municipal Corporation Act (1835) the monies had been received by Mr. Burbidge, the town clerk, and retained by him. He, however, paid interest to the mayor for the time being for his own use. No money was then handed over by the outgoing mayor to his successor; but an accountable receipt was given by the former to the latter.

The Corporation neglected to lend out the money according to the trust; and, at the passing of the Municipal Corporation Act, a large balance, alleged to amount to nearly £6000, remained in the hands of Mr. Burbidge, the town clerk. The new Corporation ap-[177]-pointed a new town clerk, and Mr. Burbidge claimed, under the Act, a large compensation for the loss of his office, the amount, which he alleged he could not get settled, exceeded the sum due from him.

It appeared that by deeds executed by Mr. Burbidge, in 1836, reciting that he had a considerable balance of the charity funds in his hands, he, Burbidge, conveyed his rights to the compensation, by way of mortgage for securing the balance due from him to the charity.

Mr. Twiss and Mr. Blunt, in support of the information, argued, that both the Corporation and Burbidge were liable for the breach of trust; the former as direct trustees, neglecting their duty and permitting the trust funds to be misemployed; and the latter having, with knowledge of the trust, received the trust monies and misemployed them for his own benefit.

Mr. Turner and Mr. Rolt, for the Corporation, contended that the Corporation had not incurred any liability; that the receipt and misapplication was the individual act of the mayor, and not of the Corporation.

That the information was defective for want of parties, inasmuch as the several mayors of the borough who had participated in the alleged breaches of trust had not been made parties.

Mr. James Parker, for Burbidge, contended that he was a mere agent of the Corporation, and accountable only to his principal, and that he had a right to set off his claim for compensation against the monies for which he was accountable to them.

Mr. Busk, for the trustees of White's charity.

[178] Wilson v. Moore (1 Myl. & K. 146), Attorney-General v. Wilson (Cr. & Ph. 28), Caffrey v. Darby (6 Ves. 488) were cited.

Mr. Twiss, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I will not trouble you to reply. I am very much surprised at the points which have been raised here, nothing being more clear than the principle on which this Court proceeds.

The Corporation of Leicester, either by original endowment or by acts of their own, appear to have been the trustees of several charitable funds, which were to be employed in making loans to a particular description of persons, which loans, when recovered from the borrowers, were to be again applied in a similar way. What has happened, in very many instances in this case, is this: the monies have been lent on bond and have been recovered, but, being recovered, they have not been lent out again, but have remained in the hands of Mr. Burbidge, the town clerk, who has employed them for his own benefit, and it is said, he has paid the interest thereon to the mayor for the time being for his own benefit. The argument is, that the consequences of this (than which a grosser breach of trust never happened) are to be entirely escaped from by the Corporation, by saying, "it was not the Corporation, but our mayor, who lent the money to our town clerk, and this was done without our authority and without any neglect on our part." That is the sort of defence which is set up by the Corporation.

[179] Now, in the first place, it cannot be disputed, that if the agent of a trustee, whether a corporate body or not, knowing that a breach of trust is being committed, interferes and assists in that breach of trust, he is personally answerable, although he may be employed as the agent of the person who directs him to commit that breach of trust. (See Fyler v. Fyler, 3 Beav. 550, and the cases cited.)

It is said there has been no neglect, for that somebody must have been employed in the business. It is true, that in a corporation, there is no single hand to receive a sum of money, therefore someone else must be employed to receive it, and here, it is said, the mayor was employed and was entrusted to do so. That might have been perfectly right, and if in the ordinary course of transactions, the mayor had been employed by the Corporation to receive the money, and, without any default of theirs, had misapplied it, I do not say the circumstances might not have been such as to exonerate the Corporation.

But what was done from year to year? Not superintending the employment of the money as they ought to have done, but, taking such representations as were made to them, the Corporation permitted the mayor, or the agent of the mayor, as it is said (though this was the agent of the Corporation as well as the agent of the mayor), to employ this money, from year to year, as they pleased, without taking, from time to time, those steps, which were always in their power, to ascertain how the money received by the mayor had been employed. Assuming it to have been right to permit the mayor to receive this money, was it enough for the Corporation to see that the mayor produced a receipt, neglecting altogether to super-[180]-intend the employment of the money according to the trust, and thus leave the mayor at liberty, for anything they knew, to allow the misemployment of the money, in the way in which it has been done in this case. There was great neglect. The Corporation of Leicester, whose servant it is said the mayor was for this purpose, ought vigilantly to have watched and superintended the employment of that money, which they placed in his hands; if they had so done, they would have known that this breach of trust had been going on. There has been a plain neglect on their part, and they are answerable for the consequences of that neglect.

I am surprised to find that there is any doubt in a case of this kind. There would be an end to all cases of breach of trust, if a trustee is to permit his agent to retain the trust money, from time to time, when his duty is to superintend and examine into the application of the money; and if, because he might have been right in allowing an agent to receive the trust money for him, he is to be considered guilty of no neglect in allowing such agent to retain it. It seems to me clear that the Corporation were answerable for the misemployment of the trust funds; and it is perfectly clear also that Burbidge is answerable, for he, the agent to the trustees, knew and was aware of it all, and he, for his own profit and his own advantage, employs this money in a way contrary to the trust, and at the same time pays to the mayor, contrary to the trust, as it would seem, the interest of this money for his own use. A more gross breach of trust, therefore, I hardly ever heard of than this seems to have been.

An objection has been raised as to parties. It has been argued that the several mayors who were cognizant of these breaches of trust ought to have been made [181] parties to this information. There has been a great deal of argument as to the propriety of bringing them before the Court in this information, to prevent their being brought here in other suits which may arise hereafter. The Attorney-General, as I understand this case, was in a situation to charge them all with these breaches of trust, personally and individually, if he thought proper. Is it the law of this Court, or is it not, that every person who participates in a breach of trust must be a party to a suit to remedy that breach of trust? A General Order was made not long ago which rendered it unnecessary to bring all the parties to a breach of trust before the Court. (1) I do not say these mayors did not join in the breach of trust; but supposing them to have joined therein, I conceive that if this General Order is to have any operation at all, it renders it unnecessary to make all persons who have joined in the breach of trust parties to a suit for the redress of that breach of trust. It is true that the consequence might be to render it necessary to file some other information; but the question is, whether the Attorney-General, complaining of the breach of trust, is to be compelled to make them parties to the present information; and I am of opinion that the order relieves him from that obligation.

I think, therefore, that both the Corporation and Mr. Burbidge are liable to repair this breach of trust; and that it was not necessary for the Attorney-General to bring those other parties before the Court; they may be liable, and may be personally called on, in another proceeding.

[182] The next question is, what are these parties answerable for? Having attended to the evidence in this case, it certainly does not appear to me that, at present, a charge has been made out against Mr. Burbidge to any greater extent than £2886, 10s. 10d., and I shall order him to pay that sum into Court. With regard to the rest, I think I may make a declaration that the Corporation is answerable to these charities for that sum and such other sums as may be found due from Burbidge to these charities on the taking of the account to be directed; but I shall not, at this time, considering the form of this information, make any order for the Corporation to pay that or any other sum into Court: that must stand over to a future occasion. An account must be taken of the several sums of money, and parts of this trust property which have been received by Mr. Burbidge in the manner stated in these pleadings; an account of the interest which he has paid on it; with liberty to the Master to state special circumstances; I must reserve further directions and costs.

I say, again, this matter might be much better arranged if payment could be had out of the compensation fund which is coming to Mr. Burbidge. It is certainly with no satisfaction that I make a decree of this sort; but, unless some arrangement can be made between the parties, as to the compensation, I have no other duty than to declare what seem to me to be the rights and obligations of the parties, and the decree must stand in the way I have pronounced it.

[183] WOOD v. WOOD. Feb. 15, 1844.

Where an estate is mortgaged, the equity of redemption, unless there appears a clear intention of making a new settlement, remains subject to the old uses, or to the trusts of the original settlement.

By a marriage settlement, a rent charge of £200 a year was secured to the wife for life, payable quarterly, with powers of distress, &c. To enable the husband to mortgage, the wife released her rent charge to the mortgagee. The equity of redemption was reserved to the husband, who covenanted to convey other lands on the trusts of the settlement. The husband, by his will, gave his real and personal estate to his brother, on condition that he would allow his wife £300 a year for life. Held, that the £200 a year remained a valid charge on the equity of redemption; and, secondly, that it was not satisfied by the £300 a year.

By the settlement made on the marriage of the Plaintiff Anna Wood with Nichol Wood deceased, and dated in 1835, Nichol Wood granted to the Plaintiff a rent charge of £200, issuing out of certain specified estates, to hold the same, from the death of Nichol Wood, during her life, for her jointure and in bar of dower or thirds, and payable quarterly, on the 25th of March, &c., with powers of distress and entry, and he covenanted to pay the rent charge, and granted a term of 100 years for securing the same by mortgage or sale.

In 1837, by indenture made between Nichol Wood of the first part, the Plaintiff, his wife, of the second part, the trustees of the marriage settlement of the third part, and Prothero (a mortgagee) of the fourth part, reciting the marriage settlement, and that Nichol Wood, having occasion to borrow the sum of £2000, had requested Prothero to advance him the same, which Prothero had agreed to do, upon having the several hereditaments, &c., thereinbefore mentioned, demised to him, freed from the annual sum of £200, and of the term of 100 years for securing the payment thereof; and reciting that it had been agreed between the parties thereto, that in order to effect the mortgage security for £2000, the several persons parties thereto of the second and third parts, respectively, should join therein, and that Nichol Wood should enter into a covenant with the several persons parties thereto, of the third part, to [184] grant some other hereditaments of a competent or equal value with the said messuages thereinbefore mentioned, for a term of 100 years, upon the like trusts, &c., as were mentioned and set forth in the marriage settlement, it was witnessed that Nichol Wood and the Plaintiff demised the principal part of the settled property to Prothero by way of mortgage for £2000 discharged and released from the jointure, subject to a proviso for redemption by Nichol Wood, his executors, administrators and assigns; and Nichol Wood covenanted with the trustees, to demise to them other hereditaments of equal value for 100 years upon the trusts, &c., of the marriage settlement.

Nichol Wood, by his will dated in 1838, bequeathed as follows: "I give and bequeath to my dearly beloved brother, Edward R. Wood, all my property, real and personal, on consideration he fulfils the following conditions. He is to allow my dear wife, Anna Wood, the sum of £300 per year, as long as she lives, and the little cottage at Pater; to pay all my just debts," &c. "If my dearly beloved brother will not undertake to do the above-mentioned articles, I wish all my property to be sold to accomplish them."

Nichol Wood died shortly after, and Edward R. Wood disclaimed.

This bill was filed by the widow against the Defendant (who was both heir and administrator, and had redeemed the mortgage) for the purpose of recovering the rent charge of £200 and the annuity of £300 a year.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Bevir, for the Plaintiff. First, although the Plaintiff joined her husband in the mortgage, and allowed the equity of redemption to be reserved to him, still she is, in equity, entitled to all her [185] previous rights upon the equity of redemption. Ruscombe v. Hare (6 Dow, 1), Jackson v. Innes (1 Bli. (O. S.) 104).

Secondly. The gift of the annuity of £300 by the will is neither a satisfaction for the rent charge of £200 a year, nor a performance of the testator's obligation to secure it. Haynes v. Mico (1 B. C. C. 129), Adams v. Lavender (M'Clel. & Y. 41), Devese v. Pontet (1 Cox, 188), Hales v. Darrell (3 Beavan, 324). The slightest circumstances of difference will prevent the Court holding a gift to be a satisfaction or a performance. Here, there are most material differences between the two annual sums. The £200 a year is a rent charge secured on real estate, with powers of distress and entry, and with a term limited to secure it by sale or mortgage, and it is payable quarterly, on the usual quarter days. On the other hand, the £300 a year is a mere personal annuity, having none of these remedies; it is payable yearly, and on a different day, and it is accompanied with the obligation to pay the testator's debts. By directing payment of his debts, the testator evidently intended to be just; by the gift of £300 a year he was desirous of being generous.

Thirdly, the covenant of the testator, contained in the mortgage deed, formed a lien on the real estate, which he was then entitled to. Wellesley v. Wellesley (4 Myl. & Cr. 561), Fremoult v. Dedire (1 P. W. 428).

Mr. Turner and Mr. J. Wilson, contra. The widow having released her right to her rent charge in a portion of the settled estate, the rent charge has, by operation of law, become wholly extinguished. (3 Cruise Dig. (4th ed.) 301; 1 Inst. 148 a., 18 Vin. Abr. 504; Butler v. Monnings, Noy, 5.)

[186] The gift of the will, being equally beneficial, is a satisfaction or performance. Weyland v. Weyland (2 Atk. 633), Walton v. Smith (4 Mad. 325), Peacock v. Glascock (1 Rep. Ch. 46), Mascal v. Mascal (1 Ves. sen. 323), Graham v. Graham (Ibid. 262), Brown v. Dawson (2 Vern. 498, and Pr. Ch. 240).

There is a difference between satisfaction and performance; in cases of performance, the Court will disregard slight differences between the obligation and the thing given; Garthshore v. Charlie (10 Ves. 13). The rent charge being destroyed, the £300 a year is given in satisfaction of the obligation created by the mortgage deed. It is of a larger amount, and equally beneficial, and is a charge upon the testator's estate, and may be distrained for; Buttery v. Robinson (3 Bingh. 392).

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The testator in this case, by his will, directed an annuity of £300 a year to be allowed to his wife as long as she lived. The wife, by her marriage settlement, dated in 1835, had a rent charge of £200 secured to her by way of jointure, and the question is, whether the annuity of £300 is to be taken in substitution of the rent charge.

This case has been argued with a great degree of ingenuity. It is said, that previously to the date of the will, the wife had no security at all for the rent charge, except the personal covenant of the husband, and that the annuity given by the will must be considered a performance of that covenant; so that the question comes to this: what was the right of the wife previous to the [187] date of the will? Now the settlement executed before the marriage gave to the wife an undoubted right to the rent charge by way of jointure. After the marriage the husband had occasion to raise money on this estate; he could not conveniently do it by means of his own interest in the estate, independently of the interest belonging to his wife; he, therefore, procured his wife to join in the security.

It is established law that where an estate is mortgaged, the equity of redemption, unless there appears a clear intention of making a new settlement, remains subject to the old uses, or to the trusts of the original settlement. In this case, can there be any doubt as to the intention of the parties? The recital distinctly shews, that the wife had nothing more in view than to assist her husband in raising the money. The recital is, that Nichol Wood, having occasion to borrow the sum of £2000, had requested Prothero to advance him the same, which he had agreed to do, upon having the security of the wife. "And whereas it has been agreed, between and by all the said several parties hereto, that in order to effect the said mortgage security" (that is distinctly stated to be the purpose) the wife and trustees should join therein, and that Nichol Wood should enter into a covenant with the parties of the third part to settle other hereditaments, of an equal value with the hereditaments mortgaged. Therefore all the purposes of the operative parts of the deed are clearly recited to be for carrying into effect the mortgage. How can I presume, as against the wife, that some other intention existed, and that the parties intended to create a new settlement, nay, further than that, that they intended wholly to deprive her of the benefit of the original settlement, and to substitute the mere covenant of the husband? I cannot presume that, for the mortgage was executed, not for the purpose of creating a new settle-[188]-ment, not in order to deprive her of any right, but for the mere purpose of enabling the husband to give a satisfactory security for the money he was desirous of borrowing. I think, therefore, that the Plaintiff has the same rights against the equity of redemption, which she would have had on the unincumbered estate if this deed had not been executed.

Having this equitable right, then arises the question whether it is satisfied. I am of opinion that there is no rule of this Court by which I can say that the gift by the will is to be considered a satisfaction.

It must be declared that the Plaintiff is entitled upon this estate, which is now released from the mortgage, to the rent charge of £200, and also to payment of the annuity of £300, if the state of the testator's assets will permit.

[188] COLYER v. CLAY. June 12, 1843.

[See Scott v. Coulson [1903], 1 Ch. 455; affirmed [1903], 2 Ch. 249.]

A fund was held on trust for one for life, with remainder between B. and C. equally, if living, with benefit of survivorship between them. B. sold his reversionary interest. At the time of the sale, C. was dead, but the fact was neither known to the vendor nor to the purchaser. Held, that the sale could not stand.

Extent of lien on a fund, where the grantor of an annuity agreed to sell to the grantee the fund on which the annuity was secured, and to repurchase the annuity, but, in consequence of a mutual mistake, the contract for the sale of the fund could not be specifically performed.

The testator John Willson, by his will dated in 1809, gave to trustees the sum of £2000, to be invested in the funds and held in trust for his wife for life, and after her decease, on trust to pay the said sum and dividends unto his nephew John W. Warren and his nephew John Willson, equally, share and share alike, in case they should be then alive; but if either of his said nephews should be then dead, then upon trust to pay the whole of the said sum unto the survivor of them, [189] his said nephews John W. Warren and John Willson to and for his own use and benefit.

The testator died soon after, and the £2000 was invested according to the trusts.

In June 1813 John Willson granted to the Plaintiff Colyer an annuity of £113 payable during his life, and he assigned all his reversionary or expectant interest in the £2000 upon certain trusts, for better securing the annuity. The deed contained a power of repurchasing the annuity, upon payment of £756 and the arrears.

John Willson fell into bad circumstances; the annuity being unpaid, a negotiation took place for the cesser of the annuity, and for the purchase by the Plaintiff, of John Willson's interest in the £2000, at a price to be fixed by an actuary. A case was accordingly, with the concurrence of both parties, laid before an actuary for his opinion. The case and the opinion were as follows:—

CASE. A., who is sixty-three years of age, has a life interest in £2000, which sum, at her death, is to be equally divided between the testator's nephews, B., who is forty-four, and C., who is twenty-four years of age, with benefit of survivorship. Quære. What is the present worth of B.'s interest, and what the value of C.'s? Considering the legacy duty of £2, 10s. per cent. to be deducted before they can receive their shares on the death of A.

OPINION. The present value of B.'s interest in the above reversions, after deducting the legacy duty is £500, 8s. And the present value of C.'s interest, after making the same deduction, is £589, 10s.

27th Oct. 1819.

WILL. MORGAN,
Equitable Assurance Office.

[190] The following contract was entered into between the parties :—

"I do hereby agree to sell to Mr. William H. Colyer, all my present and future interest and title in and to the sum of £2000, to which I am now, or may hereafter be entitled, under the will of my late uncle John Willson, at or for the price of £490; such sum to be deducted from the sum of £1416, 8s., due from me to him, and I also engage to secure to him the balance of £926, 8s., with simple interest, by my acceptance to his draft, and to execute to him a bond for that amount, whenever called on so to do.

"JOHN WILLSON.

At the same time the following account was stated between the parties :—

"I acknowledge this account to be correct, E. E. January 12th, 1820.

"JOHN WILLSON."

By an indenture dated the 1st of February 1820, reciting that Willson was indebted to the Plaintiff in the [191] sum of £1416, 8s., and that he had agreed to sell him all his interest under the will, in satisfaction of £490, 10s. part of the £1416, 8s., it was witnessed that in consideration of the £490, 10s., Willson assigned to the Plaintiff, all that sum of £2000 bequeathed by the will. Notice of the deed was given to the trustee.

It turned out, that at the date of this deed John W. Warren was dead, he having died in January 1819; but the fact was unknown both to Colyer and to Willson.

In 1836 the testator's widow died, and this bill was filed in 1839, by Colyer, praying for a transfer of the whole fund; the Plaintiff offering, in case it should appear that John W. Warren was dead prior to the purchase, to deduct, from what was due, such further sum as the Court might deem right. But if the Plaintiff should not be entitled to the benefit of his purchase, then that he might be declared entitled to a lien on the trust fund for the arrears of the annuity and repurchase-money, together with interest, or that the annuity might be declared to be subsisting, and to be, together with the arrears, a charge on the trust funds.

It appeared, in the course of the proceedings, that in the year 1817 John Willson had executed a settlement of his reversionary interest in favour of his wife and children, but notice had not been given to the trustees.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh and Mr. Chandless, for the Plaintiff. The parties proceeded on a common error; neither of them was aware of the death of Warren; and in the case stated for the opinion of the actuary, the interest of Willson seems, in several respects, to have been incorrectly stated prejudicially to the Plaintiff. The Plaintiff, though he insists on his purchase, does not [192] seek to have the advantage which he did not contract for, but he is willing to pay an increased price proportionate to the improvement of the interest by the death of Warren.

The Plaintiff consented to give up his annuity on the faith of the purchase; if the purchase is set aside, the parties must be remitted to their original position, and the Plaintiff will be entitled to the benefit of his annuity, and to a lien on the fund for the arrears down to the present time.

As to the marriage settlement, it was never communicated to the trustees. It was unknown until the filing of this bill, and it is therefore void as against the Plaintiff, who gave notice of his deeds. To perfect an assignment of a trust fund, notice must be given to the trustees. Dearle v. Hall (3 Russ. 1), Loveridge v. Cooper (Ibid.), Foster v. Blackstone (1 My. & K. 297, and 3 Cl. & F. 456).

Mr. Campbell, for Willson, and Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Moore, for his wife and children, contra. This contract was entered into by Willson, under an entire misapprehension of his interest. In consequence of the death of Warren, he was entitled in reversion, not to a moiety, but to the whole, and the legacy was stated to be £2000 money instead of stock, which was then more valuable. This contract, therefore, having been entered into under a mistake, cannot be enforced as it stands, and the Court has no jurisdiction to enforce it as asked, namely, with such a variation, in its terms, as will entirely alter the nature of the contract.

The arrangement between the parties consisted of independent matters:—a repurchase of the annuity, [193] the settlement of accounts, and the purchase of the reversionary interest. If the latter be set aside, the former will still remain, and the Plaintiff, as we admit, will be entitled to a lien, but to the extent only of the £490, 10s. purchase-money and interest.

The principle of Dearle v. Hall does not apply to such a case as this, where no new consideration was given.

Mr. Rolt and Mr. Elderton, for other parties.

Mr. Chandless, in reply. If the transaction is to be set aside at all it must be set aside in toto. Where a lease is surrendered for the purpose of granting a new one, if the latter is invalid, the Court will set up the former.

June 12. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The Plaintiff having consented to give to the Defendants the same advantage, as if they had adopted a course of their own to set the contract aside, the question is, whether, having regard to the circumstances under which it was executed, this Court can, in any way, enforce it. I am of opinion that it cannot be enforced as it stands: to do so would be manifestly unjust, because both the parties entered into the arrangement under a common mistake, which is now admitted. As the deed of 1820 cannot stand, and as this bill is filed for the purpose, amongst other things, of having it declared that the Plaintiff has a lien, to some extent, upon the funds assigned by that deed, it becomes necessary to determine to what extent, in equity, the [194] Plaintiff is entitled to a lien, and how far the Plaintiff ought to be indemnified out of the fund.

I think it has been admitted, on all hands, that the Plaintiff is not to be dismissed out of this Court without having some relief, and various propositions have been stated to me as to the extent of the relief to which he is entitled. It is said that the reversionary interest, which he intended to purchase, was valued at the sum of £490; that he struck this sum off the amount of his debt, and that this, therefore, is the sum for which he ought to have a lien; that he ought to have a lien upon the fund for repayment to him of this £490, together with interest.

Next, it is said, that if I should be of opinion that the Plaintiff is entitled to anything more than that sum, he cannot be entitled to more than the sum which he agreed to give for the annuity, which was £700, and that this is the utmost extent of equity to which the Plaintiff can be entitled as against this fund.

Upon the other hand, the Plaintiff says, I am entitled to much more than that, I ought to be restored to the annuity to which I was originally entitled, and to have a lien upon this fund for the whole amount of all the arrears of that annuity, as an annuity now continuing and subsisting. I cannot say that I can agree with any one of these propositions. I think the Plaintiff is entitled to a lien for as much as he had a lien for at the time when this transaction took place. What was that? It is clear there was an arrear of the annuity to the amount of £452, and I think there was further in arrear the sums of £28, 5s. and £113, and besides this, there was the sum of £490 which was agreed to be taken for the purchase-money of this reversionary interest. My opi-[195]-nion is, that he is entitled to a lien for these sums: for the first three, because they were due to him, and constituted a lien on the trust fund at the time; and he is entitled to the fourth sum of £490, because that was the consideration, which, by way of diminishing the debt due to him, he agreed to give for that which he supposed he had purchased at the time. He is entitled also to interest on these sums, and to the costs of suit. The Defendants will have their costs, and the residue must be transferred to the trustees of the settlement. (Reg. Lib. 1842, A. 2054.)

[195] EARL NELSON v. LORD BRIDPORT. Dec. 5, 12, 1843.

Whether, upon an application to the Master for his certificate of the necessity of a commission to examine witnesses, it is necessary to produce before him the interrogatories upon which it is intended to examine the witnesses, quære. The practice in the Masters' offices in this respect differs.

The Plaintiffs and Defendants applied to the Master for a certificate for a commission to examine witnesses abroad, and they produced to him the proposed interrogatories. He certified, in both cases, that a commission was necessary to examine witnesses "under the said interrogatories," and orders were made "accordingly." The parties afterwards, by consent, obtained an order for a single commission, directed to a sole Commissioner. The Plaintiffs examined on fresh interrogatories. Held, that under the first orders the proceeding of the Plaintiffs was irregular; and, secondly, that it was equally so under the consent order. The Court, however, refused to suppress the depositions, but made the Plaintiffs pay the costs of the application, and gave leave to the Defendants to apply to be put on a footing of equality with the Plaintiffs.

In this cause, certain inquiries as to the law of Sicily and other matters having, by the decree, been directed to be made by the Master, it became necessary to have a commission to examine witnesses in Sicily.

The Defendants having, according to the custom of the Master's (Sir G. Wilson's) office, produced their interrogatories to him, the Master, on the 16th of [196] March 1843, granted his certificate that a commission was necessary to examine witnesses "under the said interrogatories," and by an order of the same date, reciting that the Defendants "had accordingly exhibited interrogatories" for the examination in support of their state of facts and charges, and that the Master had certified that a commission was necessary to examine witnesses in Sicily, under the said interrogatories, a commission was ordered accordingly, for the examination of witnesses on the part of the Defendants.

An order was made on the 8th of June 1843, which recited that it appeared by the Master's certificate of the 3d of June that the Plaintiffs had exhibited interrogatories for the examination of witnesses, and that it was necessary to examine witnesses in Sicily "under the said interrogatories," and that it was prayed that the Plaintiffs might take out a commission, &c., "which upon hearing the said Master's certificate read was ordered accordingly."

The parties afterwards arranged that one commission only should issue, and that one of the Examiners of the Court should be appointed sole Commissioner, and, by consent, an order was made on the 14th of July, whereby, after reciting the two orders of the 16th of March and the 8th of June, one commission only issued, directed to Mr. Plumer, the Examiner of the Court. This order, however, did not, in any way, direct that the examination should be "under the said interrogatories."

In the month of September 1843 the commission was executed in Sicily; the Defendants examined their witnesses upon those interrogatories alone which had been exhibited before the Master, but the Plaintiffs examined on interrogatories afterwards prepared in Sicily.

[197] A motion was now made, on the part of the Defendants, for the publication of their evidence, and for the suppression of the Plaintiffs' evidence, on the ground of the alleged irregularity in examining upon the new interrogatories.

In opposition to the motion, it was deposed that the interrogatories exhibited before the Master were not lodged in his office like other proceedings, nor was any warrant taken out on leaving, and that it was not the practice in the offices of nine of the other Masters to require the interrogatories to be produced on applying for a certificate for a commission.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh and Mr. George Turner, in support of the motion. The Master has only certified to the necessity of examining witnesses under the interrogatories produced to him. The order of the Court for a commission is in conformity with that certificate, and limits the examination to those interrogatories. The Plaintiffs exhibited new interrogatories, a proceeding which was perfectly irregular, and this being a matter in which the Court acts with the greatest strictness, Lord Mostyn v. Spencer (6 Beavan, 135), the depositions, thus irregularly taken, ought to be suppressed. The Plaintiffs have had this advantage over the Defendants—their solicitors have communicated with the witnesses before preparing the interrogatories, while the Defendants, in obedience with the order, have limited their examination to the matters contained in the interrogatories produced before the Master.

Considering the delay and expense of a foreign commission, it is perfectly reasonable that the Master, [198] before he certifies, should see that the matters as to which it is proposed to examine the witnesses abroad are such as render it absolutely necessary for the purposes of justice to grant a commission; for that purpose he must see the interrogatories.

Mr. Tinney and Mr. Gardiner, for the Plaintiffs. The course of proceeding in Sir G. Wilson's office is not warranted by the practice of the Court. (See Anon. Seton on Decrees, 19, and 2 Smith's Pr. 163 (3d edit.).) The practice in the offices of all the other Masters is different. In nine of them it is not considered necessary to produce the interrogatories, and in the tenth (Master Senior's) the Master himself settles the interrogatories.

The production is useless, as the interrogatories, when exhibited, are in no way identified, nor is it pretended that the Master examines or settles them, as in the case of the examination of a party (see Purcell v. M'Namara, 17 Ves. 434), or of a witness previously examined. (See Vaughan v. Lloyd, 1 Cox, 313.) Anciently the interrogatories were annexed to the commission (Forum Rom. 126, Cur. Can. 243), and all commissions for the examination of witnesses were directed to be super inter inclusis (Beames' Ord. 30), and not ministrand (2 Collectanea Juridica, 202), but now the practice is for the Commissioners to examine on the interrogatories exhibited on opening the commission. (4 Beavan, 83, 84.)

Secondly, if the practice of the Master's office be regular, and the Plaintiffs be bound by the order of the [199] 8th of June, still that was superseded by the correct order of the 14th of July, which in no way limited the examination.

Thirdly, the Defendants' solicitors appear to have been aware of the proceeding; they have therefore, by their acquiescence, waived the objection.

Even if the Plaintiffs have been in error, the Court will not deprive them of their evidence by suppressing the depositions, but will make such order as justice to the Defendants requires. Willan v. Willan (19 Ves. 590) was also cited.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. It is not necessary to decide whether there ought to be an uniform rule in the offices of all the Masters, or whether the peculiar practice in the offices of Sir Giffin Wilson and of Master Senior ought to be extended to the other offices, or the practice in the remaining offices adopted by the former. It does not appear to me to be necessary to decide whether the practice in Sir G. Wilson's office is right or wrong, the question being, whether the order of the Court has been duly obeyed by the Plaintiffs, and if not, what is to be the consequence of the disobedience.

The Master was directed to make certain inquiries, and on consideration of the matter, he was of opinion, upon the application of both parties, that it was necessary that witnesses should be examined in Sicily, and he accordingly gave both to the Plaintiffs and to the Defendants certificates, that a commission was necessary to examine witnesses abroad under the interrogatories pro-[200]duced to him. The certificates extended no further than to these interrogatories, and the two orders of the Court granting commissions were in conformity with the certificates, and extended no further. It afterwards occurred, that it would be for the benefit of both parties that an Extraordinary Examiner should be appointed, and both parties agreed that one of the Examiners of the Court should be appointed sole Commissioner; accordingly, by consent, an order was made appointing him. It is alleged that this order, made by consent, wholly superseded the others, and entirely altered the terms on which the examination was to proceed. I cannot concur in that interpretation of the order. If the parties had thought it necessary, nothing would have been more easy than to have procured an extension of the order, because my impression is, that the matter need only to have been mentioned to the Court, in the presence of all parties, and an examination on interrogatories to be produced to the examiner by both parties at the opening of the commission would have been ordered; but I am clearly of opinion that the order actually made, was founded on the certificates, and upon the interrogatories certified to have been produced to the Master.

What is said in defence of the course pursued by the Plaintiffs is reduced to three heads, first, that the order of July varied the previous orders and certificates. I am not of that opinion. Secondly, that the practice in the office of Sir G. Wilson is unreasonable and ought not to be sanctioned by the Court. Whether it is reasonable or not, is a matter to be considered on another and proper occasion. Certainly there is great inconvenience in having the practice of one of the Masters' offices varying from the rest, for it has a great tendency to mislead the practitioners. The question is, whether a party who has obtained such an order as the present, [201] when he might have obtained one more extended by a proper application to the Court, is to be held freed from the terms of it, while the other party has had the disadvantage of acting under the impression that he was bound by it.

Thirdly, it is said that the Defendants' solicitors had notice of the proceedings, but, under the circumstances, I do not think that I can allow that objection to prevail.

If I allow the Plaintiffs' depositions to be suppressed, and the depositions of the Defendants to be published, the consequence will be, that the Plaintiffs will be deprived of their evidence, a result which one cannot contemplate without regret. The Court is naturally anxious to have before it, all the evidence necessary to enable it to come to a satisfactory conclusion on the very difficult question of Sicilian law involved in this case. To decide such a question on evidence confessedly imperfect would be most unsatisfactory. I cannot make the order which is asked. The Defendants' solicitors have not stated whether they would have produced fresh interrogatories, if they had been aware that they could have done so. I will therefore give them an opportunity of stating, whether they wish to have any further examination of witnesses, and then I will determine who is to pay the costs of these proceedings.

Dec. 12. The Defendants' solicitors stated, that though they would most probably, like the Plaintiffs, have had a personal communication with the witnesses, previous to the preparation of the interrogatories, if they had been aware they might have done so, still, being ignorant of the evidence already taken, they were uncertain whether [202] further evidence could usefully be adduced on the behalf of the Defendants.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. It is impossible to tell what injury has been done to the Defendants by this course of proceeding on the part of the Plaintiffs. The Plaintiffs, I think, ought to have pursued an opposite course, and if they had wished to exhibit fresh interrogatories, they should have made an application to the Court for that purpose, and have given notice to the other side.

I cannot make up my mind to suppress these depositions, but I must direct the costs of the application to be paid by the Plaintiffs, who have occasioned the necessity of making it. This order must be without prejudice to any application which the Defendants may think fit to make to the Court after the publication of the depositions.

[202] KILNER v. LEECH. Nov. 11, 1843.

[S. C. on different point, 10 Beav. 362.]

The ultimate limitation in a marriage settlement of a fund belonging to the husband was "for the next of kin or personal representatives of the husband, in a due course of administration, according to the Statute of Distributions." The husband left his wife surviving, and A. B., his next of kin, was a feme covert. In another suit, the fund had been treated as part of the residuary estate of the husband, and had been ordered to be paid over to two charities, who were residuary legatees. A bill being filed by the representatives of A. B., the next of kin, claiming the fund: Held, that the next of kin of the wife of the settlor and the charities were necessary parties, but that the representatives of the deceased husband of A. B., who had administered to his wife, were not necessary parties to the suit.

By a marriage settlement, dated in 1806, a sum of £5000 belonging to Mr. Allen was settled, in trust for Mr. Allen for life, with remainder to his intended wife for life, with remainder as Mr. Allen should appoint, and in default, "in trust for the next of kin or personal representatives of John Allen, in a due course of administration, according to the Statute of Distribu- [203]-tions." The settlement contained similar provisions and trusts, in the same event, as to the funds of the intended wife, giving her, in such case, a similar power of appointment, and in default her property was limited in trust for her next of kin or personal representatives in a due course of administration according to the Statute of Distributions.

The power did not appear to have been ever executed by Mr. Allen.

Mr. Allen by his will gave his residuary estate, upon trust for two charities, the Refuge for the Destitute and the Asylum for the Blind.

The testator died in 1825, leaving his wife surviving. At his death, Jane, the wife of Joseph Kilner, was his sole next of kin. Jane Kilner died in 1828, and her husband, having taken out letters of administration to her estate, afterwards died, and thereupon, the Plaintiff, the son of Jane Kilner, took out administration to his mother.

In 1832, after the testator's wife's death, an information of The Attorney-General v. Clark was instituted, at the relation of the treasurers of the charities, for the administration of the estate of the testator. In that suit, the accounts had been taken, and the funds apportioned, and the £5000, being treated as part of the residuary estate of the testator, had been ordered to be transferred to the charities.

This bill was filed by the personal representative of the sole next of kin of the testator, against the surviving trustee of the settlement, and the executors of the will of Mr. Allen, alleging that he had been hitherto ignorant of the purport of the settlement, and praying that he might be declared entitled to the £5000.

[204] Mr. Pemberton Leigh and Mr. Miller, for the Defendants, objected, that the bill was defective for want of the following parties; namely, first, the personal representatives of Joseph Kilner, the former administrator of Jane Kilner the next of kin; secondly, the next of kin of the testator's wife, who had an interest to contend, that they were entitled to participate in the fund, under the ultimate limitation of the settlement; and thirdly, the two charities, whom it was sought to deprive of the benefit of the proceedings in The Attorney-General v. Clark in their favour.

Mr. Kindersley, Mr. Jolliffe, and Mr. Turner, contra.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. It is objected that the Plaintiff, the present personal representative of Mrs. Kilner, has not always been so, and that her former legal personal representative is a necessary party; but that can only proceed on the ground that he has incurred some liability. I do not think he is a necessary party.

Next, it is said, that the next of kin of the wife are necessary parties, and considering the question which arises, whether the wife is to be excluded under the ultimate limitation of the settlement, I think that the prudent course will be to make her next of kin parties.

Thirdly, as to the charities. There has been an order in the other suit, for the transfer of the fund to them, and this bill seeks, in their absence, to take the fund from the parties already declared entitled to it. It is said that a mistake has been made by all parties, but whether that be so or not, there is the interest vested in the parties under the orders of the Court, and the former proceedings cannot be declared erroneous in their absence.

[205] BURRELL v. THE EARL OF EGREMONT. Dec. 8, 16, 18, 19, 1843;

[S. C. 13 L. J. Ch. 309; 7 Jur. 587. Followed and explained, Topham v. Booth, 1887, 35 Ch. D. 607. See Patten v. Bond, 1889, 60 L. T. 585. Followed, Lord Gifford v. Lord Fitzhardinge [1899], 2 Ch. 32.]

A tenant for life, by his will and under a power, charged the settled estates with £25,000 for the portions of his younger children, to be raised by means of a term vested in trustees, payable at twenty-one, and to sink into the inheritance if a younger son should become an eldest, or die without issue before the day of payment. Subject in the first place, to the sums thereafter charged thereon by his will, he devised his fee-simple estates to his eldest son for life, with remainders over. He then "gave and bequeathed" an additional £25,000 amongst his younger children, "which several portions" were to be in augmentation of the "portions" already appointed, to be raised and paid to his said sons and daughters respectively, at such times, and under such conditions, and subject to such contingencies, and with such interest, as he had before directed and appointed their original portions by that his will. And he thereby charged his fee-simple estates thereinbefore by him devised to his eldest son, with the raising and paying the said "portions" and sums of money to his said sons and daughters respectively, at the times and in the manner aforesaid; and after giving certain pecuniary legacies, he gave the residue of his personal estate, after payment of his debts and legacies aforesaid, to his eldest son; and he provided, that if the personal estate should not extend to pay such of his debts as should not be charged on his real estate and his said legacies, then he charged his fee-simple estates to make good the deficiency, and he empowered his trustees to raise thereout, not only the sums thereinbefore charged on the said premises for his younger children and such deficiency, but all other sums necessary for the purposes of his will. Held, that the additional portions given to the younger children were a primary, if not an exclusive charge, upon the testator's fee-simple estates devised to the eldest son for life.

If a tenant for life pays off a charge on the inheritance, he is prima facie entitled to that charge for his own benefit; but he may, if he think proper, exonerate the estate. In the absence of evidence, the presumption is, that he pays the charge for his own benefit, and not for the benefit of the persons entitled in remainder; but evidence may shew the contrary conclusion to be true.

A tenant for life paying off a charge upon the estate, and in the same transaction merging the security, by taking an assignment connecting it with the legal estate of inheritance, prima facie puts an end to the charge; but something is required to manifest an intention to exonerate the inheritance. A simple payment of the charge, without more, is sufficient to establish the right of the tenant for life to have the charge raised out of the estate. He has no obligation or duty to make a declaration, or to do any act demonstrating his intention; the burden of proof is upon those who allege that in paying off the charge, he intended to exonerate the estate.

A. B., being tenant for life of the testator's real estates, subject to a charge of £25,000, and absolutely entitled to the residuary personal estate, paid off the charge, and obtained releases. At the time, he seemed to have conceived that, as residuary legatee, he was liable to pay the amount out of the personal estate, which was sufficient for that purpose. Nothing was done to keep the charge on foot. After the death of the tenant for life, it being determined that the £25,000 was a primary charge on the real estate: Held, that it still subsisted as a charge on the settled estates, for the benefit of the personal representatives of the tenant for life.

In 1773 a tenant for life paid off a charge of £25,000 affecting the settled estates. He died in 1837, having in the meantime taken no steps for keeping the charge alive. Held, that notwithstanding more than twenty years had elapsed, and that there had been no part payment or acknowledgment, the charge still existed in favour of his representatives, and had not been defeated by the Statute of Limitations (3 & 4 W. 4, c. 27, s. 40). Held, also, that the statute cannot be applied to a case where there is no assignable person liable to pay the charge, no person who, by the delay, could be induced to suppose that the charge was abandoned or merged, and where the rent, out of which the interest of the charge ought to be paid, is receivable by and belongs to the same person who is entitled to the interest.

Principles on which this Court assumes that a tenant for life, who is also the owner of a charge on the inheritance, has duly discharged his duty of keeping down the interest on the charge.

The question in this cause was as to the right of the legal personal representatives of a tenant for life of real estates to recover, as against the remainder-[206]-man, the amount of charges upon the estate which had been paid off by such tenant for life. The circumstances which gave rise to the question, were shortly as follows:—

By the marriage settlement of Charles Earl of Egremont, dated in 1750, a term of years was vested in trustees for the purpose of raising, out of an estate in Yorkshire, the sum of £25,000 for the portions of his younger children.

By his will, dated in 1781, Charles Earl of Egremont, appointed this £25,000 for the portions of his younger children, and gave directions as to the payment of interest and the time of payment, and provided that if any younger son should become an eldest son, or if any younger son or daughter should die without issue, before the time of payment, his or her portion should sink [207] into the inheritance charged therewith, and not be raised or paid. He then devised his estates in Somerset, Dorset, and Cornwall (subject in the first place to the raising and paying the annuities and sums of money then affecting the same, or thereafter charged thereon by that his will, or any codicil he should thereafter think fit to add thereto), unto his eldest son George, and his assigns, for life, with various remainders over, under which the Defendant, the present Earl of Egremont, had become entitled to the estates in possession. He then gave as follows:—"I give and bequeath to my daughters Elizabeth and Frances the sum of £10,000 a-piece, and to my sons Percy Charles and Charles William £2500 a-piece, which several portions I will shall be in augmentation of, and as an addition to, the portions already provided for them by my said marriage settlement, and hereinbefore appointed to be paid to them as aforesaid, and shall be raised and paid to my said sons and daughters respectively, at such times, and under such conditions, and subject to such contingencies, and with such interest, as I have before directed and appointed their original portions to be raised and paid by this my will. And I do hereby subject and charge my manors, &c., and hereditaments in the several counties of Somerset, Dorset, and Cornwall hereinbefore by me devised to my eldest son, with the raising and paying the said portions and sums of money to my said sons and daughters respectively, at the times, and in the manner aforesaid."

After gifts of the mansion-houses, and of an annuity of £300, and of certain personal estate as heirlooms, the testator gave certain pecuniary legacies, which he directed to be exclusively paid out of certain particular parts of his personal estate. And then he gave all the residue of his personal estate, after payment of his debts and funeral expenses, and the legacies afore-[208]-said, to his eldest son; and he added a proviso, that if his personal estate should not extend to pay such of his debts as should not be charged on his real estate, and his said funeral expenses and legacies, then he charged his estates in Somerset, Dorset, and Cornwall, in aid and to make good any deficiency that might happen in his said personal estate. "And for that end and purpose," he empowered the trustees to raise by sale or mortgage of the estate, and pay, "not only the sums of money and portions thereinbefore by him charged and secured on the said premises, for his younger children, and such deficiency as should happen in his personal estate to pay his debts and legacies," but also such sums of money as should be necessary for the other purpose in his will mentioned.

Earl George attained his age of twenty-one in the year 1772, and in May 1773 he, out of his own monies, paid the original and additional portions of his sister Lady Elizabeth, and on that occasion the real and personal estate of Earl Charles were released. In 1776 Earl George, out of his own monies, paid the original and additional portions of Lady Frances, and obtained a release, as heir of the body and executor of his father. In 1778 and 1781 respectively, he in like manner paid the original and additional portions of Percy Charles, and Charles William, who thereupon executed releases. (NOTE.—The deeds executed on these occasions are more fully stated in the judgment of the M. R., post, 227, 228, 229, 230.) During his life Earl George did not indicate whether he intended the additional charges paid off by him to merge for the benefit of those entitled in remainder or not.

Earl George died in 1837. By his will he, amongst other things, devised his hereditaments in the counties of Wilts, Somerset, Devon, Dorset, and Cornwall to the De-[209]-fendant Earl George Francis, and the heirs male of his body, and in default of such issue, unto the persons, and for such estates, as the estates in the same counties were, by the will of Charles Earl of Egremont, devised, after failure of the heirs male of his body.

This bill was filed by the legal personal representatives of George Earl of Egremont, seeking to have the £25,000, bequeathed, in addition, by the will of Earl Charles to his younger children, and which had been paid by George Earl of Egremont to his brothers and sisters, raised out of the real estates of which he had been tenant for life, and to which estates the present earl had now become entitled.

The Defendant resisted this claim on three grounds; first, he said, that the sum of £25,000 was a mere legacy, primarily charged on the personal estate of Charles Earl of Egremont, admitted by all parties to have been sufficient for its payment; and that as it was charged on the real estate as an auxiliary security only, and had been properly paid out of the personal estate, the residuary legatee had no right to a reimbursement. Secondly, that even if it were primarily charged on the real estate, still George Earl of Egremont did not intend, when he paid it off, to keep it alive, but to have it released, and that it had been released accordingly. Thirdly, that if the right claimed by the Plaintiffs ever existed, it was now barred by the Statute of Limitations.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh, Mr. Turner, Mr. Lee, and Mr. Piggott, for the Plaintiffs. The first question is, whether this £25,000 is a primary charge on the real estate. It is to be observed, that throughout the will of Charles Earl of Egremont, there is a marked distinction preserved between legacies and [210] portions. The original sum of £25,000, and the additional sum of £25,000 are called "portions," the other sums are called "legacies." The portions are to be "raised" and paid, terms peculiarly applicable to a charge on realty. The devise of the real estate is subject to the "raising" of the sums thereafter charged, and the testator afterwards expressly "charges" his manors, &c., "with raising and paying the said portions or sums to his said sons and daughters;" besides this, the gift of the personal estate is subject to the debts and "legacies," but not to the portions; and the charge in aid is only for the debts and legacies, and not for the portions.

Again, the additional portions of £25,000 are to be raised and paid to his said sons and daughters, respectively, at such times and under such conditions, and subject to such contingencies, as the original portions; so that if a child died without issue under twenty-one, the portion was to sink into the inheritance, which would not be the case if it were a mere legacy out of the personal estate.

Where there is an additional bequest, it is subject to the same incidents and contingencies, and is payable in the same manner, and out of the same fund, as the original gift; Crowder v. Clowes (2 Ves. jun. 449. And see Day v. Croft, 4 Beav. 561, and the cases there referred to). On the first point they cited Reade v. Litchfield

(3 Ves. 474), Bootle v. Blundell (19 Ves. 516), Kirke v. Kirke (4 Russ. 435), Shipperden v. Tower (1 You. & Col. (C. C.), 441), Williams v. The Bishop of Landaff (1 Cox, 254), Jones v. Bruce (11 Sim. 221).

Secondly, where a person seised in fee or in tail pays off a charge on the estate, it depends on his intention whe-[211]ther the charge is kept alive or not; if it be a matter of indifference, and he has expressed no intention on the subject, the charge is held to have merged; but where a party dies without any indication of his intention, the Court considers what would be most beneficial to him, and it is immaterial whether at law the charge has merged or not; Forbes v. Moffatt (18 Ves. 384): though it be merged at law, still it may be subsisting in equity. Here the party was not the owner of the estate, but was merely tenant for life; the presumption, in such a case, is in favour of the charge being preserved, and the onus of proof of the contrary lies on the remainder-man. It is not sufficient to shew a vague intention, but the Court must be satisfied that the tenant for life relieved the estate from the charge, with the intention of never claiming it, and, that, in fact, he intended to make a present of the amount of the charge to the remainder-man. In Drinkwater v. Combe (2 Sim. & St. 340), Sir John Leach said, "if a tenant for life pay off a charge upon his estate, the amount becomes a part of his personal property, unless he manifests an intention that it shall not do so." In Trevor v. Trevor (2 Myl. & K. 675) a tenant for life in remainder redeemed the land tax, and afterwards became entitled to the estate in fee, and devised it by his will: Sir John Leach said, "when Lord H. took the assignment of the land tax to himself, that act amounted to a declaration of his intention that the land tax redeemed should be part of his personal estate. It could not afterwards sink into the real estate without his expressed intention to that effect, and there is no evidence of any such intention. It continues, therefore, to be part of his personal estate."

[212] In the present case, Earl George never evinced any intention. The deeds shew that he was altogether ignorant of his rights, and by a mistake, originating during his minority, the personal estate was considered primarily liable. All the subsequent deeds proceed on the same error. The Court will relieve in such cases; Earl of Buckinghamshire v. Hobart (3 Swan. 186).

Lastly, it will be contended that the Plaintiffs' claim is barred by the Statute of Limitations (3 & 4 W. 4, 27, s. 40) which enacts, that no suit shall be brought to recover any money charged on land, but within twenty years "next after a present right to receive the same shall have accrued to some person capable of giving a discharge for or release of the same, unless, in the meantime, some part of the principal money, or some interest thereon, shall have been paid, or some acknowledgment of the right thereto shall have been given in writing, signed by the person by whom the same shall be payable or his agent, to the person entitled thereto or his agent; and in such case, no such action, or suit, or proceeding, shall be brought but within twenty years after such payment or acknowledgment, or the last of such payments or acknowledgments, if more than one, was given."

The first answer to the objection founded on this statute is, that this clause only applies where there exists a person to pay, and one to receive, the amount of the charge and the interest. It can only apply where it is capable of this qualification—that there is one person to demand and another to pay. Now it was quite impossible for Earl George both to pay and receive the interest: it would be absurd for George Earl of Egremont, by whom the interest was payable, or his agent, to give "some acknowledgment of the right thereto" to George Earl of Egre-[213]mont, "the person entitled thereto." According to the argument on the other side, however clearly Earl George might have declared his intention of keeping the charge on foot, it would have been impossible for him to do so; it may therefore be said that the right did not accrue until the death of Earl George. The second answer is, that interest has, in substance, been regularly paid. The Court will so assume, for where a person fills two inconsistent characters, he must be taken to have fulfilled the obligations of each. Thus where a mortgagee in possession purchases the interest of a tenant for life, it is assumed, that he keeps down the interest, and time does not run against the remainder-man. Corbett v. Barker (1 Anst. 138, reversed 3 Anst. 755), Ashton v. Milne (6 Sim. 369), Raffety v. King (1 Keen, 601), Brocklehurst v. Jessop (7 Sim. 438). Lastly, in cases of mistake, the time runs from the discovery, and is, like the case of fraud, provided for by the twenty-sixth section. Brooksbank v. Smith (3 You. & Col. (Exch.), 58), and this is a mistake which is relievable; Denys v. Shuckburgh (4 You. & Col. (Exch.), 42).

Mr. Tinney, Mr. Kindersley, and Mr. Lloyd, contra. First, as to the construction of the will of Earl Charles. It is quite an elementary proposition, that if a testator gives a sum of money, either as a legacy or as a portion or provision for his child, such gift is a mere pecuniary bequest payable out of the personal estate; if he adds that it shall be a charge on his real estate, the personal estate still remains primarily liable, and the real estate is only to be applied in aid of the personalty. On the other hand, if the gift be of a sum expressly to be raised out of the real estate, or if there be a devise of a real estate subject to, or charged with, or upon the [214] condition of making payment thereout, of a given sum, which sum is not otherwise bequeathed by the will, then the charge is exclusively on the realty. The Plaintiff who asserts that the personalty is exonerated, is bound to prove it; it is not sufficient for him to shew that there is a charge on the real estate, but he must do more: he must shew that the personal estate is exempted. The rule has been laid down differently by various Judges. Originally, express words were necessary to exempt the personal estate. (Fereyes v. Robertson, Bunb. 301, and Dolman v. Smith, Prec. Ch. 456.) This was afterwards altered. In The Duke of Ancaster v. Mayer (1 Bro. C. C. 462) Lord Thurlow thought that "a declaration plain or manifestation clear" was necessary. In Brummel v. Prothero (3 Ves. p. 113) the expression "irresistible inference" which was used, was commented on by Lord Alvanley, who said:—"As to the irresistible inference, I do not know what is meant by that. I admit, it must be such an inference, as leaves no doubt upon the mind of the person who is to decide upon it. It must be irresistible to my mind." In Boole v. Blundell (1 Mer. 219), Lord Eldon, in referring to this expression, says, "I can find no rule deducible from all that has been said on the subject, but this (which appears to be a rule supported by all the cases taken together), namely, that since it has been laid down that express words are not necessary to exempt the personal estate, there must be in the will that which is sometimes denominated 'evident demonstration,' sometimes 'plain intention,' and 'necessary implication,' to operate that exemption." In Lord Inchiquin v. French (Amb. 37) Lord Hardwicke remarks, "The general rule of law and equity is, that the personal estate is the first fund for payment of debts; and as to [215] proper legacies it is considered as the only fund, both in the ecclesiastical and in this Court; if, therefore, the personal estate is to be exempted from these charges, it must be so expressed, or it must appear from a plain necessary implication arising from the words of the testator; and in such case of an implication or plain intention, without express words, it must appear that the personal estate is given as a specific bequest in some shape." In Samwell v. Wake (1 Bro. C. C. 145) it was held that in order to exonerate the personal estate from the payment of debts and legacies, it is necessary, not merely to charge the real estate, but the will must exempt the personal estate. Lord Thurlow says, "I believe it is very clear, that here is not enough to exonerate the personal estate. The personal estate is the proper fund: in order to exempt it, the testator must express his intent. It is not sufficient to charge the real, but he must shew that his purpose is, that the personal should not be applied. The words to be attended to are those relative to the personal estate. He gives pecuniary legacies, and then, by a very loose clause, gives the residue to Samwell. I am called upon to construe the most large and loose residuary clause that ever was seen, in such a way as to change the natural order of payment. Where the intent is strongly expressed, and it is for near relations, old cases have carried the matter farther than good sense without precedents would have done." In Tower v. Lord Rous (18 Ves. 138) Sir William Grant thus states the rule: "The personal estate, being the proper and primary fund for the payment of debts and legacies, can be exempted only by express declaration or plain and unequivocal manifestation of intention. The question generally is, whether there is sufficient evidence of that intention. It is agreed, that neither a charge upon the land, nor a [216] direction to sell, nor the creation of a term for payment, will exempt the personal estate." So, Lord Redesdale in McClelland v. Shaw (2 Sch. & Lef. 544) says: "Except Webb v. Jones (2 Bro. C. C. 60) there is not, I apprehend, a single case in which it has been held that personal estate was exempt from payment of debts and funeral expenses, without express words for the purpose; except where personal estate has been given as a specific legacy: for if it is given in terms which do not imply that it was intended as a specific legacy, it is not held to be exempt from the charges which the law imposes on it."

Apply these expositions of the law to the present case. The testator says, "I give and bequeath to my daughters, &c., the sum of £10,000 a-piece." This is a simple pecuniary legacy. Calling these sums "portions" amounts to nothing: they would be equally portions, whether payable or raiseable out of the personal or out of the real estate. Then it is said there is a charge of these sums on the devised estates; but all the cases shew that this is not, of itself sufficient. Next there is no specific gift of the residue, which according to the cases of Bootle v. Blundell and Webb v. Jones, is required. It is next said that the real estate is devised subject to the sums charged. No doubt it is, but that leaves the question, whether the real estate is primarily charged, or merely in aid of the personalty, perfectly open. Then as to the additional portions being paid out of the same fund, that rule applies only where there is a previous gift: here there is none: there is a mere appointment of the original portions, operating as under the settlement. Lastly, it is argued that the additional portions are to be subject to the same conditions and contingencies, &c. There is no difficulty in this, for the additional portions may be subject to similar [217] conditions and contingencies as the original portions, so far as they are applicable, and yet be payable out of the personalty. If the Defendant be right on this point the Plaintiffs' case entirely fails.

Secondly; suppose the personal estate exonerated, then as to the effect of the acts done by Earl George. The rule is thus laid down by Lord Thurlow in Jones v. Morgan (1 Bro. C. C. 218): "A tenant for life, in general, paying off a charge, without taking an assignment, is a creditor for the sum so paid; but the smallest demonstration that he meant to pay it off, will prevent his representative from coming for the money." Is there not something more than "the smallest demonstration" in the present case? Earl George, being tenant for life, with remainder to his own issue, it was quite natural for him, upon attaining twenty-one, and finding himself in possession of considerable personal estate, to release the family estate from the incumbrance for the benefit of those who might succeed him. When he paid off the charges, no transfer was made of them to a trustee for himself, as would have been done if he intended to keep them on foot; but they were absolutely released and merged in the inheritance. From 1772 to 1837 not the slightest trace appears of any intention to keep the charges on foot, or that Earl George even supposed them to be in existence, and no claim was made by anyone till his death.

Thirdly; the dispositions contained in the will of Earl George are quite inconsistent with the notion that he intended the settled estates in Somerset, Dorset, and Cornwall should remain charged with the £25,000, for he devises to the Defendant his own fee-simple [218] estates in those counties, clearly intending, so far as he could, to augment those estates which were to go with the title.

Lastly; the claim is barred by the Statute of Limitations, which is binding on Courts of Equity, and is positive in its terms. It enacts, that no suit shall be brought to recover any sum secured on land, but within twenty years after a present right to receive shall have accrued to some person capable of giving a release. Earl George having acquired the right, upon payment of the charges, and being then capable of giving a release, this period, therefore, expired twenty years after payment. Then comes the exception, "unless in the meantime some part of the principal money, or some interest thereon, shall have been paid or some acknowledgment of the right thereto shall have been given in writing, signed by the person by whom the same shall be payable or his agent, to the person entitled thereto or his agent." None such was given, and therefore the claim is extinguished. The argument on the part of the Plaintiffs is strange: they say, that because a party cannot come within the saving clause or an exception of an Act, therefore he is not within the Act at all. Such cannot be the proper construction; but here it was very possible for Earl George to have preserved his right, either by having the charge assigned to a trustee, and giving an acknowledgment to them; or secondly, by calling on the trustees to raise the money by a mortgage executed to a trustee of himself as tenant for life; or thirdly, by an application to a Court of Equity. The argument on the other side is inconsistent with itself; on the one hand, it is said, that interest could not be paid, and that, therefore, the case is not within the Act; and on the other, that it was paid by retainer, and therefore that the Act does not apply. The cases of Corbett v. Barker (1 Anst. 138, reversed 3 Anst. 755) and Raffety v. King (1 Keen, 601) do not apply; for there a third party had a right to call for the performance, by the tenant for life, of a duty: here the only duty of the party was to himself.

The case is next put on mistake, which, it is said, is equivalent to fraud; but that is not so. Cases of mistake are not excepted by the statute; if it were, the Court does not relieve in cases of mistake of law. St. Paul v. Viscount Dudley and Ward (15 Ves. 167), where a tenant for life of a manor took a surrender of a copyhold to himself and it merged. If it were otherwise, then, under the twenty-sixth section, the mistake or fraud might "with reasonable diligence have been first discovered" at the time when the charges were paid off. The charges have merged at law, and the Plaintiffs who represent Earl George, cannot, after sixty years' delay and acquiescence, be entitled to be relieved from the mistake.

Brooksbank v. Smith (2 You. & Col. (Exch.), 58) and Denys v. Shuckburgh (4 You. & Col. (Exch.), 42) were not cases under the present Statute of Limitations.

Mr. Lee, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS reserved his judgment.

April 17, 1844. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. This bill is filed by the legal personal representatives of the late George Earl of Egremont against the present [220] earl, and it prays that an account may be taken of the principal money and interest alleged to be due to the Plaintiffs in respect of a sum of £25,000 charged on certain estates in the counties of Somerset, Dorset and Cornwall, by the will of Charles Earl of Egremont, the father of the late Earl George and the grandfather of the Defendant, and that the amount of what shall be found due may be raised by sale or mortgage of a sufficient part of the estates, and paid to the Plaintiffs.

By a settlement, dated the 26th of February 1750, and made on the marriage of Earl Charles, certain estates in the county of York were vested in trustees for a term of 600 years, in trust for raising by mortgage or sale £25,000 for the portions of his younger children.

In the month of July 1761 there were five children of the marriage, George, the eldest son, and four younger children: namely, Percy Charles, Charles William, and the Ladies Elizabeth and Frances, who were together entitled to the £25,000 provided for their portions by the settlement; and Earl Charles, by his will dated the 31st of July 1761, appointed the £25,000 as follows; viz., £10,000 to Lady Elizabeth; £10,000 to Lady Frances; £2500 to Percy Charles; and £2500 to Charles William.

By the same will, he devised his estates in Somerset, Dorset and Cornwall, to his eldest son, the late Earl George for life, with remainder over, by virtue of which the Defendant became entitled to those estates; and he gave to his daughters Elizabeth and Frances, £10,000 a-piece and to his sons, Percy Charles and Charles William £2500 a-piece, and calling these sums of money portions, he subjected and charged his estates in Somerset, Dorset and Cornwall, which he had devised to his eldest son with the raising and paying the same; and after [221] bequeathing certain legacies, he gave the residue of his personal estate to his eldest son. He appointed his wife and brother guardians of his children, and appointed his wife sole executrix until his eldest son George should attain twenty-one years of age, and after that time, appointed his eldest son George sole executor.

After the date of the will, the testator had a fourth son, William Frederick, the father of the Defendant, and, by a codicil dated the 22d of June 1763, he made provision for his son William Frederick, but the directions as to the portions which by his will he had given to his other younger children were not altered.

After the death of Earl Charles, his eldest son, being still a minor, the will and codicil were proved by the widow, who possessed the personal estate; but after Earl George attained his age of twenty-one years, he proved the will and codicil, and became the sole legal personal representative of his father Earl Charles.

The portions provided for his younger children by the will of Earl Charles were paid by Earl George out of his own money, and on the occasion of each payment, certain deeds were executed, and releases were taken from the sons and daughters to whom the payments respectively were made. The last payment was made in the month of January 1781, from which time it does not appear that any mention was made of the portions during the life of Earl George, who died on the 11th of November 1837, having made a will whereof the present Plaintiffs are executors.

The Plaintiffs contended, that by the will of Earl Charles the additional portions thereby given were exclusively or primarily charged on the estates in [222] Somerset, Dorset, and Cornwall, which were devised to Earl George for his life: that Earl George, the tenant for life, having paid the charge out of his own money, became, thereupon, entitled to the charge for his own benefit, and so continued during the whole of his life; and that the Plaintiffs, as his legal personal representatives, are now entitled to have the same raised.

On the other hand, the Defendant contends, first, that, according to the true construction of the will of Earl Charles, the estates in Somerset, Dorset, and Cornwall, were only charged in aid of the personal estate of Earl Charles, and not exclusively or primarily, with the payment of the additional portions; secondly, that Earl George, by his payment of the portions and his execution of the several deeds made on the occasions of such payment, declared his will and intention to be to exonerate the estates charged from the payment thereof, and that the estates ought to be deemed to be exonerated from the payment, even if the charge was, upon the construction of the will, an exclusive or primary charge on the devised estate, and not merely a charge thereon in charge of the testator's personal estate; thirdly, that even supposing the charge to be an exclusive charge on the devised estates, and that Earl George did not act to exonerate the devised estates, yet, as his right to the charge accrued in 1781, he ceased, upon the expiration of twenty years without payment of interest or any acknowledgment, to be entitled to sue for the charge, and the same cannot now be recovered.

Some question was made as to the effect of the will of Earl George, but it does not appear to me that it contains anything which affects the right or interest of either party.

[223] The first question is, whether, according to the true construction of the will of Earl Charles, the additional portions, amounting to £25,000, ought to be considered as general pecuniary legacies payable primarily out of the testator's personal estate, or whether they are to be considered as portions, exclusively or primarily charged upon and payable out of the estates in Somerset, Dorset and Cornwall, devised to Earl George for life. The words by which the additional portions are given and bequeathed, if taken by themselves, constitute distinct gifts, which would be primarily payable out of the personal estate. The Defendant relies mainly upon this, and upon there being no term or estate created for the purpose of raising the additional portions; but it is necessary to examine the whole scope and context of the will for the purpose of ascertaining the effect of it.

The testator begins his will, by reciting and confirming the settlement of his estates in York, Cumberland, and Sussex, made on his marriage: and he appoints the £25,000, thereby raisable by sale or mortgage, for the portions of his younger children, directing the whole to be raised and paid, as to £10,000 part thereof for his daughter Elizabeth, for part of her portion, as to £10,000, other part thereof, to his daughter Frances, for part of her portion, as to £2500, other part thereof, to his son Percy Charles, for part of his portion, and as to the sum of £2500, residue thereof, to his son Charles William as part of his portion; and after giving directions as to the payment of interest and the time of payment, he provided, that if any younger child should die without issue before the time of payment, his or her portion should sink into the inheritance charged therewith, and not be raised or paid.

The testator, after devising to his eldest son certain purchased estates in York and Essex, proceeds to devise [224] the estates out of which the Plaintiffs seek to raise the sum now in question, and he devises his estates in Somerset, Dorset, and Cornwall, "subject in the first place to the raising and paying the annuities and sums of money now affecting the same, or hereinafter charged thereon by this my will, or any codicil I shall hereafter think fit to add thereto, unto my eldest son and his assigns for and during the term of his life." Then follow the various remainders over. It is observed as material, that no devise is made, otherwise than subject to the charges to be made thereon by the will. After completing the limitations of his estates in Somerset, Dorset, and Cornwall, he gave as follows:—"I give and bequeath to my daughters, Elizabeth and Frances, the sum of £10,000 a-piece, and to my sons Percy Charles and Charles William, £2500 a-piece.

No doubt, if the gifts had ended here, they would have been general legacies payable out of the personal estate, but in pursuance of the same sentence, and speaking of the sums so given, he proceeds to describe them as portions, thus: "Which several portions I will shall be in augmentation of, and as an addition to, the portions already provided for them by my said marriage settlement, and hereinbefore appointed to be paid to them as aforesaid." Now by the settlement, those portions were to be raised by sale or mortgage out of the York estates, and by his will he had directed them to be paid with interest to the sons at twenty-one years of age, to the daughters on attaining that age or marriage, and that if any younger son should become an eldest son, or any younger son or daughter should die without issue before the day of payment, the portion should sink into the inheritance. And as to these sums of money, which he calls portions, in augmentation of and addition to the others, he directs, that they "shall be raised and paid to his said sons and daughters respectively, at such times, and under such [225] conditions, and subject to such contingencies, and with such interest, as I have before directed and appointed their original portions by this my will. And I do hereby subject and charge my manors, &c., and hereditaments in the several counties of Somerset, Dorset, and Cornwall, hereinbefore by me devised to my eldest son, with the raising and paying the said portions and sums of money to my said sons and daughters respectively, at the times and in the manner aforesaid."

Considering the distinct and appropriate use which the testator makes of the word "portions"—that the devise of the Somerset estates is expressly made subject to the charges afterwards made thereon—that the gifts of the subsequent sums to the daughters and younger sons are expressly stated to be in augmentation of the portions, and are made payable at the same times, and subject to the same contingencies, and that then immediately the Somerset estates are charged with the raising and paying them, at the time and in the manner aforesaid, it appears to me that these several provisions are consistent only with the intention, that these additional portions should be raised out of the estates devised to the eldest son; and I think that the words in which the sums of money which constitute the subject of the charge are given, are not sufficient to throw the legacies, or to leave them a charge, exclusively or primarily, on the personal estate, unless the will should be found to contain other provisions tending to corroborate that conclusion. But the other provisions of the will, instead of having that effect, appear to me to have a contrary tendency. After the gifts of the mansion-houses and of an annuity of £300, and of certain personal estate as heirlooms, the testator gives certain pecuniary legacies, which he directs to be exclusively paid out of certain particular parts of his personal estate. And then he [226] gives all the residue of his personal estate, subject to his debts and funeral expenses and the legacies aforesaid, to his eldest son; and he adds a proviso, that if his personal estate shall not extend to pay such of his debts as should not be charged on his real estate, and his said funeral expenses and legacies, he charged his estates in Somerset, Dorset, and Cornwall, in aid, and to make good any deficiency that might happen in his said personal estate. I do not think that the legacies here referred to, comprise the additional portions before charged on the estates in Somerset, Dorset, and Cornwall, and we immediately afterwards find the testator mentioning the legacies and portions distinctly, and he proceeds thus, "And for the end and purpose" (that is for the purpose of making good the deficiency he was providing for), he empowers the trustees to raise, "by sale or mortgage of the estate, and pay, not only the sums of money and portions hereinbefore by me charged and secured on the said premises for my younger children, and such deficiency as shall happen in my personal estate to pay my debts and legacies, but also such sums of money as shall be necessary," for the other purpose in his will mentioned. Taking the whole of this will into consideration,

I am of opinion, that the effect of it is to make the additional portions given to the younger children, a primary, if not an exclusive, charge upon the estates in Somerset, Dorset, and Cornwall, devised to the eldest son for life.

We have next to consider the effect of the several acts done by Earl George with reference to the payment of the several portions to his brothers and sisters. If a tenant for life pays off a charge on the inheritance, he is, prima facie, entitled to that charge for his own benefit; but he may, if he think proper, exonerate the estate. In the absence of evidence, the presumption is, [227] that he pays the charge for his own benefit, and not for the benefit of the persons entitled in remainder; but evidence may shew the contrary conclusion to be true.

The Lady Elizabeth Alicia Maria was married to Mr. Henry Herbert in the year 1771, and upon that occasion, two instruments were executed, and an account stated; and by one of the instruments, it was recited, that the Lady Elizabeth was, by virtue of the settlement executed before the marriage of the late Earl Charles, and by his will, entitled to two sums of £10,000 each, amounting together to £20,000 for her fortune or portion, and that the said two sums of £10,000 and £10,000 were charged upon and to be paid out of the real and personal estates of Earl Charles; and by the other of the instruments, after reciting the settlement and the will of Earl Charles, it was further recited, that upon the treaty for the intended marriage, it had been proposed and agreed, that the several principal sums of £10,000 and £10,000 the original and additional portions of the Lady Elizabeth, so charged upon and payable out of the real and personal estates of Earl Charles, should be assigned as therein mentioned; and by the account then stated it appeared, that the interest of one sum of £10,000 was paid by the guardians of Earl George, and that the interest of the other sum of £10,000 was paid by the countess, the executrix of the late Earl Charles.

Earl George attained his age of twenty-one years on the 18th of December 1772; and on the 11th of May 1773 he paid the sum of £20,000, pursuant to an arrangement made on the marriage of his sister the Lady Elizabeth to Mr. Herbert; and upon that occasion, a deed was executed by and between Mr. Herbert and the Lady Elizabeth of the first part, the Earls of Pembroke, Ashburnham, [228] and Thomond, and Charles Herbert, of the second part, the Countess Dowager of Egremont and the Earl of Aylesford, of the third part, and George, Earl of Egremont, therein described as the eldest son and heir and executor of the will of his father Earl Charles, and also residuary legatee in the same will named, of the fourth part; and thereby, after reciting, amongst other things, that Earl George had attained his age of twenty-one years, and thereupon became entitled in possession to, and soon afterwards entered upon, the real estates limited and devised to him by the settlement and will of Earl Charles, and upon which, or upon part of which, the principal sum of £10,000, the original portion of the Lady Elizabeth, stood charged, and that the said Earl George, also, upon attaining his age of twenty-one years, became entitled to the residuary personal estate of his father, which had been accounted for and satisfied to him by his guardians; and that having entered upon his real estates and possessed himself of his father's residuary personal estate, he was desirous to pay off and discharge the several sums of £10,000 and £10,000, being the amount of the original and additional portions of his sister Lady Elizabeth, it was witnessed, that under the circumstances and for the reasons therein mentioned, the Earls of Pembroke, Ashburnham, and Thomond, and Charles Herbert, assigned the said two sums of £10,000 and £10,000 to Henry Herbert, and appointed Earl George, as executor, residuary legatee, and heir to his deceased father, and in every other right and capacity him thereunto requiring, to satisfy the same sums of £10,000 and £10,000 to the said Henry Herbert, and the same were accordingly paid; and the said Henry Herbert acknowledged the receipt thereof, in full satisfaction of the original and additional portions of the Lady Elizabeth, and of all claims and demands in respect thereof, upon the estates real and personal of [229] Earl Charles, or upon the Dowager Countess, and the Earl of Thomond, or either of them; and Henry Herbert released them, and all and singular the estates real and personal of Earl Charles, from the same, and covenanted to do any other act required for further releasing the same, and better extinguishing the same sums of money and all claims of Henry Herbert and Lady Elizabeth by reason thereof, or upon the estates of Earl Charles.

In the same month of May 1773, and by deed, dated the 11th of the same month, and made between Earl George, described as the eldest son and heir of Earl Charles, of the one part, and the Dowager Countess and the Earl of Thomond and John Drummond of the other part, after reciting, amongst other things, that there was standing in the names of the Earl of Thomond and John Drummond, the capital yearly sum of £2186, 7s. 5d. consolidated long annuities, which had been purchased out of the surplus produce of the real and personal estates of Earl George, during his minority, and were his absolute property in his own right, and that the portions of Lady Elizabeth had been paid, and that the Lady Frances, being in the eighteenth year of her age, and her portions being payable at her age of twenty-one years or day of her marriage, Earl George, in order to exonerate, as well the residuary personal estate of his late father, of and from the payment of the additional portion, legacy, or sum given to the Lady Frances by her father's will, and also the settled estates, and all other the estates real and personal of Earl Charles, of and from the original portion or like sum of £10,000 provided for Lady Frances by the settlement, and to secure and provide for the more immediate payment of the several portions or sums of money, when and as the same should respectively become payable, had proposed and agreed, that the yearly sum of £784, 6s. 3d. long [230] annuities, part of the yearly sum of £2186, 7s. 5d. long annuities before mentioned, should be appropriated and set apart to answer and pay the several portions of the Lady Frances, when the same should become payable; and after reciting, that for the same purposes, Earl George had proposed and agreed, that the yearly sum of £392, 3s. 2d. long annuities should be appropriated and set apart to answer and pay the portions and additional portions, by the settlement and will of Earl Charles provided for his younger sons Percy Charles, and Charles William. It was, by the said deed, witnessed, that the same long annuities should be appropriated and set apart for the purposes of the recited arrangement.

By another deed, also dated the 11th day of May 1773, after reciting the matters aforesaid, Earl George allowed the accounts of his mother and guardians, and released his claims as residuary legatee.

On the 9th day of July 1776 the Lady Frances attained her age of twenty-one years. Soon afterwards, the long annuities set apart to answer her portions were transferred into her name, and thereupon, by deed-poll dated the 29th August 1776, she acknowledged that she accepted the same in full satisfaction of her portions under the settlement and will of her father, and she released Earl George, as well in his own right, as in his character of heir of the body and executor of his father.

Percy Charles attained his age of twenty-one years on the 27th of September 1778, and Charles William attained his age on the 8th of October 1780. At these times respectively, the long annuities provided to answer the portions, were insufficient for the purpose: the sums required to make up the deficiencies were supplied by [231] Earl George, and the younger sons, Percy Charles and Charles William, upon receiving the long annuities and the sums to make up the deficiencies, i.e., upon receiving their whole portions, executed releases dated, as to one of them, on the 25th of December 1778, and as to the other of them, on the 31st of January 1781.

We cannot now know what Earl George might have said or done, if he had been told, that the charge of the additional portions exclusively or primarily affected the estates in Somerset, Dorset, and Cornwall: that he was under no obligation to pay the same out of his own money, and that paying the same he would be, or was personally, entitled to the benefit of the charge. Under the circumstances, it is possible, perhaps not improbable, that he might have desired and declared his intention to exonerate the estate; but, after a careful consideration of the deeds which were executed on the several occasions on which the portions of the younger children were provided for and paid, I am of opinion that the question was never brought to his attention. The original portions were known to be charged on the York estates, and were so treated; and there are expressions in the deeds which are to be explained with reference to them, and to the estates on which they were charged; but it seems to be clear, that Earl George conceived himself, as executor and residuary legatee, bound to pay the additional portions out of his own money, or the personal estate of which he was residuary legatee. He was ignorant that the additional portions were properly and primarily chargeable on the real estates, of which he was tenant for life; and the nature of the charge being unknown, and unalluded to in the deeds, they contain no indication whatever of intention either to continue the charge or to exonerate the estate.

[232] A tenant for life paying off a charge upon the estate, in the same transaction merging the security, by taking an assignment, connecting it with the legal estate of inheritance, prima facie puts an end to the charge; but something is required to manifest an intention to exonerate the inheritance. A simple payment of the charge without more, is sufficient to establish the right of the tenant for life to have the charge raised out of the estate. He has no obligation or duty to make a declaration, or to do any act demonstrating his intention. The burden of proof is upon those who allege that, in paying off the charge, he intended to exonerate the estate. (See St. Paul v. Viscount Dudley and Ward, 15 Ves. 173.)

In this case, there is no evidence whatever, except that which may be derived from the execution of the several deeds which have been stated; and as it does not appear from those deeds that Earl George knew his rights, it cannot be collected from them, that he intended to waive, or in any way relinquish, his rights. The words of the deeds are fully satisfied, and are explicable only on the supposition that he did not know that he had any right to have the additional portions raised out of the devised real estate, and that he did understand it to be his obligation to pay them out of the personal estate or his own money.

If it had been necessary to shew, otherwise than by legal presumption, that Earl George intended to continue the charge, it would have been impossible to prove it, because it does not appear that he knew there was a primary charge, and the Plaintiffs could not have proved that he intended to continue a charge, the existence of which, as a primary charge, was unknown.

[233] The difference between the situation of the Plaintiffs and that of the Defendant is this—that there is a presumption in favour of the Plaintiffs and not in favour of the Defendant. In the relation which subsisted between Earl George and the estate, the law presumes, that in paying off the sum charged, he did not intend to exonerate the estate.

It may be true, that if Earl George had known the nature of the charge, and that he might have raised it for his own benefit, he might have thought fit to exonerate the estate; but this is no more than conjecture, and, in the absence of sufficient evidence, it cannot countervail a legal presumption, and I am under the necessity of concluding, that Earl George did not, by his acts, upon payment of the portions, exonerate the estates from the additional portions charged thereon by the will of Earl Charles, and that after the payment of the portions in the year 1781, Earl George was entitled to have the amount raised for his own benefit.

With respect to the Statute of Limitations, it was argued for the Defendant, that the right, if any, of Earl George to the charge on the land in respect of the portions, accrued, at the latest, on the 31st day of January 1781, when the last portion was paid. Releases having been given, it is said that the trustees could not have raised the portions at their own discretion, upon the demand of Earl George: that if he had desired to avail himself of the charge, and have it raised for his own benefit, he must have filed a bill against the trustees and the remainder-man; and that his right, in this respect, accrued sixty years before the present bill was filed. Earl George, it is said, if he had any right, was to be considered as in possession of an estate exonerated, with a right to reimpose the charge; and his right to [234] reimpose the charge is lost by neglect, non-claim, and lapse of time, under the statute. This argument, however, assumes, that the estate was exonerated, which is the point in question; but it is further said, that there is no pretence that any rent was ever applied, or intended to be applied, in payment of interest, so that Earl George, if he ever was entitled to the charge, received no interest upon it: that he received the rents, and applied them to his own use, without any regard to the charges; and that his acts, in that respect, ought not to be qualified for the benefit of his executors.

The statute (3 & 4 W. 4, c. 27, s. 40) enacts, that no suit shall be brought to recover any sum of money secured by any mortgage, judgment, or lien, or otherwise charged upon or payable out of any land or rent, but within twenty years next after a present right to receive the same shall have accrued, to some person capable of giving a discharge for or release of the same, unless, in the meantime, some part of the principal money, or some interest thereon, shall have been paid, or some acknowledgment of the right thereto shall have been given, in writing signed by the person by whom the same shall be payable or his agent, to the person entitled thereto or his agent.

Now it is undoubted, that the right of Earl George to receive the charge accrued to him in the year 1781—that no subsequent acknowledgment of his right thereto was ever made, and that more than twenty years after the right accrued expired in the lifetime of Earl George. But it is argued for the Plaintiffs, that the clause in the statute cannot be held to apply to cases which do not admit of the qualification referred to in the same clause, [235] and that, under the circumstances of this case, Earl George ought to be deemed to have kept down the interest on this charge.

The clause of the Act assumes, that there is not only a person capable of giving a discharge or release, but also an assignable person by whom the charge is presently payable, or who is capable of paying the principal or interest of the charge, or of making an acknowledgment of the right thereto; but, in this case, there was a charge upon the estate which no assignable person was then liable to pay, and in respect of which no person was capable of making an acknowledgment that it was due, as, during the life of Earl George, it was necessarily uncertain who, at the time of his death, would be the person to take in remainder subject to the charge. It is further argued, that the statute can only apply to cases, where one person is entitled to receive and give a discharge, and another person is entitled to pay or capable of giving an acknowledgment of the right to the charge; and that if the statute were held to apply to a case like the present, it would apply to a case where the tenant for life had expressly declared his intention to keep the charge alive, or had procured a term to be vested in trustees for the purpose of keeping it alive, unless he had gone through the ceremony of paying money to the trustees, for the purpose of receiving it back from them under the name of interest on the charge. On the whole, it appears to me that the statute cannot be applied to a case where there is no assignable person liable to pay the charge, no person who, by the delay, could be induced to suppose that the charge was abandoned or merged, and where the rent, out of which the interest of the charge ought to be paid, is receivable by and belongs to the same person who is entitled to the interest.

[236] Before the charge was paid to the younger children, it was the duty of Earl George to pay or account for the interest to them, and to prevent any accumulation against the remainder-man. After the portions were paid (supposing Earl George to have become entitled to the charge for his own benefit), it was still his duty to prevent accumulation of interest against the remainder-man. Nothing is more common, than for a man to have, with reference to the same property, a right to receive the income, and a duty to apply the income, or to make payments out of it in a certain manner. If the property producing the income be absolutely his, subject only to a charge, in respect of which it is his duty to make payments of interest out of the income, and he becomes owner of the charge, there is an end of the duty to make the payments; but the duty to make the payments may not be a simple duty owing to the person entitled to receive interest. Where the estate in the property charged is limited, as in the case of a tenant for life, the duty of paying interest to the person entitled to receive it, may be connected with the further duty of preventing the accumulation of interest against the remainder-man; and where the owner of the rent has become owner of the charge, if the duty to prevent accumulation of interest upon the charge against the remainder-man continues, this Court will hold a tenant for life, owner of a charge on the inheritance, to have discharged that duty. It is presumed to be done, first, on the ordinary principle, that this Court will assume to be done that which the party might and ought to have done; secondly, to prevent any prejudice arising to the remainder-man by the accumulation of interest; and, thirdly, to prevent multiplicity of suits, and relieving the remainder-man, compelled to pay an accumulation of interest, from the necessity of suing the representatives [237] of the tenant for life, whose duty it was to pay the interest, for reimbursement.

It was contended, that if the duty to pay comprised no duty to any one but the party entitled to receive, the Court would not interfere or in any way qualify the acts of the tenant for life, for the purpose of deeming the duty to be satisfied or not. I agree to that; but in the case of tenant for life, owner of a charge on the inheritance, it is not merely with reference to the party himself that the duty of paying the interest arises: he receives the income, and is entitled to the interest payable thereout; and when he has received the income, he is deemed to have paid or kept down the interest, not because of any duty which he owes to himself, but because he has a duty to another, i.e., to the remainder-man, to prevent the accumulation of interest against him. If you suppose the charge to be a subsisting charge, there being no express payment of interest, no act by which the payment of interest can be proved, there would be an accumulation of interest against the remainder-man, if the law did not presume a duty to prevent it, and also a satisfaction or performance of that duty, by the person who received the income, by the due application of which the duty ought to have been performed. It is not, I think, necessary to assume as a fact (though this has been done) that the tenant for life must have received the interest of the charge, at the times when he received the rents of the estate. It is sufficient, that, by a rule of law, the tenant for life of an estate who is also the owner of a charge on the inheritance must, in favour of the remainder-man, be deemed to have kept down the interest of the charge out of the rents received; and I think that the remainder-man in whose favour this rule has been established cannot be permitted to contend, that the interest, thus [238] for his benefit deemed to have been kept down and paid, was, in fact, not paid, for the purpose of enabling him to say, that, under the Statute of Limitations, the right to sue for the charge is lost. Under these circumstances, I think that the case does not come within the purview of the Statute of Limitations.

Under the circumstances, and for the reasons I have stated, it appears to me that the Plaintiffs are entitled to the relief which they pray.

Declare, that, according to the true construction of the will of Earl Charles, the additional portions, amounting to £25,000, thereby given to the younger children therein named, constitute a primary charge on the estates by the said will devised to the testator's eldest son for his life; and that Earl George, the tenant for life of those estates, having paid the same additional portions to the persons entitled thereto, out of his own monies, became and was, and up to the time of his death continued to be, entitled to the same charge for his own benefit, and that the Plaintiffs, as his legal personal representatives, are now entitled thereto, as part of his personal estate. Take an account of what is due, and decree the amount to be raised.

The Defendant appealed, but the case was afterwards compromised, by the Plaintiffs making some concessions.

Executors employed an auctioneer, who received the deposit. After some necessary delay, the purchases were completed on the 17th of December 1831. The auctioneer failed to pay over the deposit. The executors acting under legal advice, took no legal proceedings against him till the 14th of March 1832, and the money was lost. The auctioneer was not, at the completion of the sales or afterwards, in circumstances to pay the balance. Held, under the circumstances, that the executors were not personally liable.

This was a suit instituted against the surviving executors, for the administration of a testator's estate.

By the decree, it was, amongst other things, referred to the Master, to "enquire and state to the Court, what sales had been made of the leasehold estates of the testator, and whether any and what deposits were left in the hands of the auctioneer, and to what amount, and under what circumstances.

The Master, by his report, found, that Messrs. Griffith, Hopkins & Cooper, formerly carried on business as auctioneers to a very large extent, and were considered to be men of high character, ability and integrity, and had been employed by the testator: that Griffith and Hopkins, having amassed considerable fortunes, relinquished the business to Cooper, who continued to carry it on down to January 1832, "and was considered, by people in his neighbourhood, to be a person of integrity and credit, and enjoyed a good reputation."

That the executors, being unable to let the leaseholds, employed Cooper to sell them by auction. That they were accordingly sold by him on the 30th of May 1831, and that the deposits, to the amount of £619, were paid to Cooper, the auctioneer; that delays in completing the purchases unavoidably occurred, but that ultimately, on the 17th of December 1831, the sales were completed; that Cooper did not attend on that occasion, and that the solicitors of the executors, by letter written [240] on the 21st of December, expressed their surprise at this, and appointed the next day for a meeting; that Cooper's son then attended, and stated that his father had made large advances on the faith of the completion of the sale of an estate, and that until he received that money, he could not pay over the balance of the deposits, and that he promised the Defendants to send his father's accounts to the executors' solicitors on the following day; that Cooper attended the next day, and his account being produced and examined, he was required to pay the balance; that he stated his inability to do so at that time, but that he had a sale of a large property shortly, by which he should receive a considerable sum, and should then be able to pay the balance due from him. That the executors consulted with their solicitors several times between the 30th of December 1831 and the 21st of January 1832, on the best means of obtaining payment of the balance due from Cooper; and that on the 21st of January 1832 the solicitors wrote to Cooper, stating, that if he did not come to a satisfactory settlement, they should be compelled to adopt coercive measures against him immediately; that Cooper did not send any answer, and that the executors frequently consulted with their solicitors, after they had written the last-mentioned letter, on their being unable to see Cooper, or obtain payment of the balance due from him; and that they instructed their solicitors to issue a bailable writ against Cooper, which was done on the 14th of March 1832, and a warrant was placed in the hands of a very active officer to execute, but that the officer was never able to discover Cooper. That the executors were unable to discover where Cooper was, for a period of upwards of six years, but that they had lately found that Cooper left his residence in the last week in January 1832, and went to Gravesend, and [241] subsequently into divers parts of England, where he continued to secrete himself for upwards of six years.

The Master also found that Cooper was not, at the time of the completion of the sales, or at any time subsequent, in circumstances to pay the balance so due from him.

The cause now came on for further directions, when the question was, whether, under the circumstances, the executors were or were not personally liable for the loss which had occurred.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh and Mr. J. J. Williams, for the Plaintiffs, contended that the executors were personally liable for the amount lost by the insolvency of the auctioneer; that they ought not to have left the money in his hands, and that they had not used due diligence in proceeding against him after his default in December; that to release a trustee or executor, where he employs an agent, it must be shewn that the money was not lost by any want of diligence. That here, from December to March, no active step had been taken to compel Cooper to pay the money; and which, if taken, might have proved successful.

Mr. Turner, in the same interest.

Mr. Tinney, contra. The executors are not liable; they left the deposit in the hands of the auctioneer, who acted as the agent of both parties. Up to December they could not do otherwise. After that time, they acted bona fide, under legal advice, and did all that could be done to re-[242]-cover the amount. Cooper seems to have absconded in January, and from the Master's report, it appears that Cooper was not, at the time of the sale, or any time subsequent, in circumstances to pay the balance due from him.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. There seems to be some difficulty in this case. The executors, in the discharge of their duty, were under the necessity of employing an auctioneer; and until the purchases were completed, the deposit remained in the hands of the auctioneer, as the agent for both the vendors and purchasers. There can be no objection against their employing this gentleman as an auctioneer. On the 17th of December 1831 the purchases were completed, and from that time the money belonged to the executors, and Cooper must then be considered to have held it for them. The auctioneer did not attend at the completion on the 17th of December, and on the 21st the solicitors wrote a letter, in which they expressed their surprise, and required explanation, and which was delivered on the 21st. The son attended next day, and informed the executors that his father could not pay the balance until he received monies which he had advanced on other sales. That being an unsatisfactory state of things, what ought the trustees to have done? This depended on the circumstances of the auctioneer. The matter goes on, nothing is effected until January 1832; there is, then, a threat of coercion, and in March a capias is sued out. Under all the circumstances, this might have been the most prudent course to pursue. I have great reluctance in charging the trustees. The estate has suffered, but not from the executors having improperly or inconsiderately employed this man, and the executors appear to have been acting under the [243] advice of their solicitors from day to day. I will look further into it.

Nov. 17. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. I have considered this case, and I think, under the circumstances, that the executors cannot be charged. They were under the necessity of employing an agent, and after the completion of the contract, they appear to have taken all the pains they could in the matter. Acting under legal advice, on which they seem to have relied, they pursued that which was considered the most prudent and proper course, and a loss has unfortunately arisen.

I have not been able to find any case in which, under similar circumstances, executors have been charged.

[243] SAMUDA v. LOUSADA. Dec. 22, 1843.

Power to appoint an annuity held, under the circumstances, to authorize the appointment of the principal sum invested in the funds for securing it.

A testator bequeathed an annuity of £500 a year to his daughter for life, and directed an investment in the funds for securing it, and after her decease, he directed the "annuity" should go as his daughter should by will appoint, and in default, the "annuity" should be applied towards the maintenance of her children till twenty-one, and then the "principal sum" to the children, with a gift over "of the said principal sum of money." Held, that the daughter had the power of appointing the principal sum.

The testator, by his will, dated in 1803, gave his daughter an annuity of £500 a year for the term of her natural life, and he directed his executors to invest in the public funds a sum of money "sufficient to produce, and effectually yield and secure the said annuity of £500 to his said daughter;" and after her decease, the testator "directed that the said annuity or yearly sum of £500 should go to and for the use of such person or persons, intents or purposes," as his said [244] daughter should by will appoint, and in default he directed "the said annuity or yearly sum of £500" should be applied for the maintenance and education of her children until they attained twenty-one, "and then upon trust, as to the principal sum so to be invested as aforesaid, and all interest due thereon, to and amongst" the children of his daughter living at her death, with a gift over "of the said principal sum of money," in case of her dying without leaving lawful issue, and intestate, or if the children should die under twenty-one.

The sum of £16,666, 13s. 4d. consols was purchased for securing the annuity, and the produce paid to the daughter for life.

The daughter by her will, dated in 1837, made an appointment of the £500 a year, and, so far as she could or might, of the sum of £16,666, 13s. 4d. consols invested for securing that annuity.

This was a petition that the consols might be transferred to the Petitioner the appointee, on the trusts of the will of the daughter.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh, for the Petitioner, contended that the daughter had the power of appointing the principal sum. (See Page v. Leapingwell, 18 Ves. 463; Haig v. Swiney, 1 Sim. & S. 487.)

Mr. Turner, contra, contended that the testator had, by his will, made a distinction between the "annuity" and the "principal sum," and had given his daughter the power of appointing the annuity only, which would be limited to a life interest; Blewitt v. Roberts (Cr. & Ph. 274).

[245] Mr. Pemberton Leigh, in reply. This is a general power of appointment carrying the whole annuity. The subject of the power is the same as of the gift over in default of children.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] held that the daughter was authorized to appoint the capital.

Where the substantial equity of a Plaintiff's bill is denied by the answer, the Court will not, on motion, direct the preliminary enquiries, under the 5th General Order of May 1839.

A bill was filed to set aside a voluntary settlement, on the ground of the insolvency of the settlor, the insolvency being denied by the answer, the Court declined ordering, on motion, the preliminary enquiries as to the parties interested under the settlement.

This was a motion, before decree, for a reference to the Master to make certain preliminary enquiries under the 5th Order of May 1839. (Ordines Can. 136.)

In 1812, upon the marriage of Edward Whitmore with Frances his wife, a sum of £10,000 Reduced annuities was vested in trustees, upon trust for Edward Whitmore for life, and after his decease (in the events which happened) upon trusts for the children of the marriage.

In March 1835 Edward Whitmore was possessed of a policy of assurance, on his own life, in the Equitable, for a sum of £5000, which, by an indenture dated the 5th of March 1835, he assigned to trustees upon the trusts of his marriage settlement.

On the 1st of July 1841 Edward Whitmore and his partners became bankrupts.

[246] This bill was filed by the assignees of Edward Whitmore, alleging that at the time Edward Whitmore executed the deed of the 5th of March 1835 he was insolvent, and seeking to set it aside, as voluntary and executed for the purpose of delaying his creditors.

The bill alleged, that there were seven children of the marriage, one of whom had died an infant in 1840, and that one had married the Defendant Halsey, and that under some indenture of settlement executed previously to their marriage, Halsey and his wife claimed to be entitled to one-seventh share, or to some other interest, in the said policy of assurance.

The answer of Robert and George Whitmore denied the insolvency of the firm of Whitmore, Wells, Wells & Whitmore, and also of Edward Whitmore, previous to 1835; and Robert Whitmore also said, that having learned in 1835 that Edward Whitmore was about to be married again, and also that Caroline, one of his daughters, was about to be married to Mr. Halsey, he thought it advisable that the policy of assurance should be assigned to the trustees of the marriage settlement, as a better provision for the children of his first marriage, and in order that a larger settlement might be made on Caroline, the wife of Mr. Halsey, who was then about to be married. That, accordingly, upon the application of Robert Whitmore, Edward Whitmore, before any marriage was solemnized, agreed to assign the policy of assurance, and, under those circumstances, did execute the deed of the 5th of March 1835, and, by an indenture dated the 11th of March 1835, Edward Whitmore appointed, among other things, that one equal seventh part of the monies to become payable on the said policy of assurance, should, upon the solemnization of the said intended marriage, become an interest vested [247] in the said Caroline Whitmore, and should be transferred and paid to her executors, administrators and assigns, as soon as conveniently might be after the decease of him Edward Whitmore.

A motion was now made by the Plaintiffs, under the 5th Order of May 1839 (Ordines Can. 136), for a reference to the Master, to inquire when Frances Whitmore, the wife of Edward Whitmore, died; what children there were of the marriage, when they were born, whether any were dead, when they died, and whether any such children, being a son or sons, had at the time of his death attained twenty-one, or being a daughter or daughters, had attained that age or been married, and who were the personal representatives of such child or children; and also to inquire, what children there had been born of the marriage of the Defendant Halsey and Caroline his wife, and when they respectively were born, and whether any of them were since dead, and if dead, when they respectively died.

Mr. Purvis and Mr. Pryor, in support of the motion, cited Hawkins v. Hawkins (1 Hare, 543).

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Walpole, for the Defendants Robert and George Whitmore, resisted the proposed reference, contending that at the hearing the enquiries now asked might be found to be unnecessary; that the Plaintiffs must shew an existing necessity for the enquiries, before the Court would make the order; Breeze v. English (2 Hare, 118); that, as it was stated by the Defendants' answers that the assets of the settlor, in 1835, were sufficient to pay all demands upon his separate estate, [248] there was therefore, under that state of circumstances, no reason for asking for these enquiries; Topham v. Lightbody (1 Hare, 289), Frost v. Hamilton (4 Beav. 33).

Mr. Turner and Mr. Freeling, in the same interest. Edward Whitmore was solvent in 1835, and the invalidity of the assignment has not yet been established. The settlement was made by Edward Whitmore, the elder, in contemplation of a second marriage, and so far as relates to Mrs. Halsey, it was supported by a valuable consideration, and was not voluntary. The Plaintiffs, therefore, cannot ask for enquiries respecting the persons entitled under her marriage settlement, and have made no prima facie case to support their claim against it.

Mr. Purvis, in reply. The Plaintiffs have, specifically, by their bill, stated debts existing in 1835 and at the time of the bankruptcy, shewing that the firm was insolvent in 1835: they are not denied. This then is a prima facie case. Independently, however, of that, where a class of persons is interested, the Court requires that the preliminary enquiries should be made before it will determine any question relating to the property claimed by the class. Convenience requires that this should be done before the hearing, to prevent the cause then standing over; and this was the very object of this General Order.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The order referred to was made for the purpose of accelerating a cause, and to give the Plaintiffs an opportunity of shewing, at the first hearing, that the proper parties were before the Court. In that respect the order has been effectual. The Court, however, will not direct preliminary enquiries, unless it be plain that they will serve some useful purpose, nor will the reference be made when the Plaintiffs shew no right to them.

The Plaintiffs in the present case claim to set aside a deed, on the ground that the assignor was insolvent at the time of its execution. This is the question to be litigated between the assignees and the persons claiming under the settlement, and can only be determined when all the facts are in evidence before the Court. The answer wholly denies the Plaintiffs' claim; and it cannot be known until the hearing whether the defence is sufficient to rebut the Plaintiffs' demand. At the hearing an enquiry would probably be asked, if the Plaintiffs then appeared to have a probable ground for relief, because the Plaintiffs could not have a decree against absent persons; but if the cause were before the Court upon evidence, and the Plaintiffs' right being denied, the evidence appeared satisfactory against the claim, the Defendants would at once ask that the bill might be dismissed, and if that were done, the enquiries would turn out perfectly useless.

The Plaintiffs' case not being made out, and there being a direct denial by the Defendants of the Plaintiffs' title, the enquiries ought not to be directed, though they may hereafter turn out to be necessary.

No order can therefore be made as to the preliminary enquiries, for with the denial in the answer, the Plaintiffs have not shewn such an interest as to entitle them to [250] the reference. The costs must be reserved to the hearing.

See Meinertzhagen v. Davis, 10 Sim. 289; Lee v. Shaw, Ib. 369; Logan v. Baines, Ib. 604; Wilson v. Applegarth, Ib. 657.

[250] DALTON v. HAYTER. April 17, 1844.

A Plaintiff may set down a demurrer, for argument, without waiting for the Defendant to enter it with the registrar.

Whether, since the orders of 1841, it is necessary for a Defendant to enter a demurrer with the registrar within eight days at all, quære.

A Defendant neglected to enter his demurrer with the registrar within eight days, the Court refused to overrule it on that ground.

In this case, the Defendant filed a demurrer to the whole bill on the 21st of March 1844. The Defendant did not enter the same with the registrar within eight days, and the Plaintiff applied to the Master of the Rolls, ex parte, for an order disallowing it as of course under Lord Clarendon's Order. (Beames' Ord. 173, Sanders' Ord. 298.) This order is as follows:—

"Every demurrer shall express the several causes of demurrer, and shall be determined in open Court; and such pleas also as are grounded upon the substance and body of the matter, or extend to the jurisdiction of the Court, shall be determined in open Court, and for that purpose the Defendant is to enter the same with the registrar within eight days after filing thereof, or in default of such entry made, the same shall be disallowed of course as put in for delay; and the Plaintiff may then take out process to enforce the Defendant to make a better answer, and pay 40s. costs; and the same shall not afterwards be admitted to be set down or de-[251]-bated, unless upon motion it shall be ordered by the Court." (See Jordan v. Sawkins, 3 B. C. C. 372; Bullock v. Edington, 1 Sim. 481; Hearn v. Way, 6 Beav. 369.)

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS declined making the order at present, but allowed the Plaintiff "to set the demurrer down for argument" within the twelve days allowed by the 34th Order of August 1841. (Ord. Can. 174.) This step to be, however, without prejudice to the Plaintiff's right to insist on the same objection when the demurrer was called on.

The demurrer, having been regularly set down by the Plaintiff accordingly, now came on for argument, when

Mr. Wood insisted that it ought to be overruled, in consequence of the neglect of the Defendant to enter it with the registrar. He argued that it was still necessary for a Defendant to enter a demurrer "with the registrar:" that a Plaintiff could not set down a demurrer "for argument" until the Defendant had so entered it: and that the non-entry by a Defendant would render it impossible for the Plaintiff to comply with the exigency of the 34th Order of August 1841, and set it down for argument within the twelve days. That the Plaintiff would be greatly prejudiced if he were not allowed the benefit, to which, according to the strict practice of the Court, he was entitled.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Beavan, contra. The entry "with the registrar" is a mere useless form, and is so considered by the officers of Court. It now consists merely of paying a shilling fee (Ord. Can. 108), and in no way ad-[252]-vances the hearing of the demurrer, which depends on the order to set it down "for argument," which may be obtained by the Plaintiff, immediately on the demurrer being filed, and without waiting until it has been entered with the registrar.

The object of Lord Clarendon's Order was this: formerly demurrers were referred to the Master, but by Lord Bacon's (Beames' Ord. 22, and Sanders' Orders, 115) and Lord Clarendon's (Beames' Orders, 173, and Sanders' Orders, 298) Orders, they were directed to be determined by the Court, and for that purpose a duty was imposed on the Defendant to enter them with the registrar. Now by Lord Cottenham's Order, a Plaintiff is bound to set the demurrer down for argument: this latter order has therefore superseded the former one, and the practice founded on it.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I am very much at a loss to understand the object for which this objection is made. Cases have occurred in which a Defendant seeing an objection plainly appearing on the bill, has, purposely, allowed the Plaintiff to proceed with his bill, in order to turn him round on that very objection at the hearing; whereas, if such Defendant had demurred, the Plaintiff, by submitting and amending his bill, might easily have removed the objection. I have seldom heard it said, that it is for the benefit of a Plaintiff to prevent the hearing of a demurrer, for if the bill is defective, it is greatly to the advantage of a Plaintiff to have the objection pointed out to him, if it be fatal it will save all further expense, and if it can be cured, the Plaintiff has an opportunity of removing the defect by amendment.

[253] This demurrer was filed on the 21st of March, and by Lord Cottenham's Order, it became incumbent on the Plaintiff to set it down for argument within twelve days. It is said that the Plaintiff was desirous of setting it down at once, but was prevented, because the preliminary step of entering it had not been taken by the Defendant: that the Plaintiff was therefore compelled to wait till the end of the eight days, and the Defendant not having entered the demurrer with the registrar, the Plaintiff is entitled to have it overruled. When an application was made to me on a former occasion, I directed the objection to stand over, and gave leave to the Plaintiff to set down the demurrer for argument, without prejudice to his right to insist on his objection.

We are now in this situation:—The Defendant, alleging that he has cause of demurrer, is desirous of submitting it to the Court to-day. The Plaintiff says, No, I will take advantage of non-entry, and the demurrer must be overruled. Suppose all this were done, the Defendant would still be allowed to make a special application to be relieved, and to have the demurrer heard. How, therefore, any advantage can arise by refusing to hear the demurrer now, I cannot make out.

It is said that this course is warranted by the strict practice. Now, as to the practice, it is plain, that these demurrers were, in ancient times, referred to the Master. Lord Bacon's Order was made to prevent it, and directs that no reference upon a demurrer shall be made to the Masters, but that it shall be heard in Court. For that purpose it was necessary that it should be set down, but no provision for setting it down was made by Lord Bacon's Order; and the hearing, therefore, of the demurrer might be indefinitely delayed. To meet this, [254] the order of Lord Coventry was made (Sanders' Ord. 180), which evidently proceeded on the supposition, that the entry was for the purpose of setting it down to be heard by the Court; for the registrar, at the instance of the party demurring, was to "put it into the paper of causes after the hearings, assigning a speedy day to everyone in order."

This order was varied by Lord Clarendon's Order, directing demurrers to be determined in open Court, "and for that purpose the Defendant was to enter the same with the registrar within eight days after the filing." It was to be entered with the registrar, for the purpose, no doubt, of being set down to be heard by the Court. It is clear, however, from the subsequent practice, that the entering and setting down was not, afterwards, considered the same thing, for after entry with the registrar, another application was necessary to have it set down to be heard on the next day for hearing demurrers. (See the form of the order, 2 Turner's Prac. 278; 2 Newland's Prac. 332.) The rule was, that after a demurrer had been once entered with the registrar, either party might make application to have it set down to be heard in Court (1 Turner's Prac. 813), so that the preliminary duty of entering it with the registrar was to enable either party to have the demurrer heard in Court, and such was the invariable practice of the Court until the New Orders of 1841.

The 34th Order imposes on the Plaintiff the necessity of setting down the demurrer for argument, within twelve days from the time allowed for filing the demurrer; not from the time of filing the demurrer or of the Defendant's entering it with the registrar, but from the time allowed for filing a demurrer. The question is, whether after this order, when the Court has imposed on the Plaintiff the penalty of having the demurrer to the bill allowed, unless he does a certain act within twelve days from a time described, you are to shift that period, and say that the Plaintiff shall not have twelve days from the time allowed for filing a demurrer, but from the time of the Defendant's entering it with the registrar. I was desirous of knowing what had been the practice since these orders came into operation, and I have been informed that demurrers have constantly been set down for argument here, without any regard to the entry. When the demurrer has been set down elsewhere, the practice may have been otherwise.

I am at a loss to say that the entry is necessary to enable the Plaintiff to do that act in default of which the demurrer is to be allowed, or that his compliance with the 34th Order is to depend on any act of the Defendant. I have some doubt, whether, since Lord Cottenham's Order, Lord Clarendon's Order is applicable, and whether any entry is now necessary; but, without determining that point, I must say that even if there had been an irregularity, I should, under the circumstances, give leave to the Defendant to correct it. It is for the benefit of the Plaintiff himself that the matter of the demurrer should be decided.

NOTE.—By the XLIV. General Order of the 8th of May 1845 pleas and demurrers need not be entered with the registrar.

[256] DAVIS v. PROUT. Nov. 10, Dec. 11, 1843.

Where, at the hearing, a cause stands over, with liberty to amend, and the bill is amended accordingly, a new subpoena to hear judgment must be served.

This cause came on upon the 10th of November 1843; on which occasion, the Defendant Prout did not appear, but a proper affidavit of service of the subpoena to hear judgment was produced.

The other Defendants who appeared having objected to the frame of the record, the cause was ordered to stand over with liberty to amend.

The bill was accordingly amended, and the cause again came on for hearing on the 11th of December, but no new subpoena to hear judgment had been served.

The Registrar observed that the cause could not proceed, there being no proof of service on Prout of a new subpoena to hear judgment.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS considered the objection valid, observing that if the other Defendants had not voluntarily appeared, the Plaintiff could not have obtained a decree against them, upon proof of the service of the former subpoena to hear judgment.

[257] PRINGLE v. CROOKES. Dec. 9, 22, 1843.

A Defendant took exceptions to the Master's report, and also presented a petition of rehearing, objecting to the original decree, on the ground of want of parties, and also to a part of that decree. The exceptions and rehearing came on together. Held that the Defendant was entitled to begin.

A testator directed his real estate to be sold by his Jamaica executors, and the produce remitted to A. and B., his English executors. B. and C. were the consignees and agents of the testator, and of his executors. The assets, including £2253, part of the produce of the real estate, were remitted from Jamaica to B. and C. on account of the executors in England, and the amount was entered to the credit of the estate of the testator. After the death of B., A. instituted a suit for an account of the receipts of B. and C., on account of the personal estate of the testator since his death, but the heir at law was not made a party. The bill specified the item of £2253 which the answer stated to be the produce of the real estate. The decree directed an account of the dealings and transactions in the bill mentioned, and of the receipts of B. and C. on account of the testator's personal estate since his death, and the Master, in taking the accounts, charged C. with the £2253. The Defendant C. obtained a rehearing of the cause, and excepted to the report, and contended, either that the decree was wrong in authorizing an account of the real estate in the absence of the heir, or that the Master had been wrong in including this item; but the Court overruled the objection.

The Defendant Crookes and his partner Todd were the agents and consignees in England of the testator, Robert Marshall of Jamaica.

By his will Robert Marshall directed his executors in Jamaica to sell his real and personal estate in Jamaica, and remit the proceeds to Great Britain, to his executors there; and he appointed Todd and the Plaintiff Pringle his executors in England. After the testator's death, his executors in Jamaica made their remittances to England (including therein the proceeds of the real estate in Jamaica), to the house of Todd and Crookes, intending them for the executors in England, viz., for Todd (who was a partner in the firm of Todd & Co.) and the Plaintiff Pringle.

This bill was filed after the death of Todd by Pringle, the surviving English executor, to have, as against Crookes the surviving partner, and against the executor of Todd the deceased partner, an account of the receipts and payments of Todd & Co. as such agents and consignees. The heir at law was not made a party to the suit.

[258] The bill, in praying an account of the receipts of Todd & Co. after the testator's death, asked only for an account of all sums of money received by them on account of his personal estate subsequently to his death. The bill, however, specifically stated several sums as having been received by Todd & Co., during their agency from the executors, amounting in the whole to the sum of £2253, 4s. 10d. The bill did not state that these sums were parts of the purchase-money arising from the sale of the real estate; but it distinctly appeared from the answer that they were received on account of such purchase-money.

By a decree of the Court of Exchequer, the Master was directed to take an account of all and singular the dealings and transactions in the bill mentioned between Todd & Co. and Robert Marshall deceased, and of all sums of money received by them on his account in his lifetime, and of all and singular the said dealings and transactions with them, and of all sums of money received by them, on account of his personal estate, since his decease.

The Master, in his report, stated the nature of the account, and that it continued to be an account current up to the death of Todd; and that the several sums, amounting together to the sum of £2253, 4s. 10d. were received by Todd & Co., and were entered to the credit of the estate of Robert Marshall in the same account current, and were payments on account of the purchase-money for the Ridge estate.

Before the Master's report had been made, the Defendant Crookes, having ascertained that the Master intended to charge him with the purchase-money which Todd & Co. had received and entered to the credit of Robert Marshall's estate, presented a petition of re-[259]-hearing, alleging that he was aggrieved by the decree, and he submitted that the cause ought to have been ordered to stand over, with liberty for the Plaintiff to amend his bill by adding parties thereto (meaning the heir at law of the testator), or that the accounts, by the decree directed to be taken, of the dealings and transactions with Todd & Co., since Robert Marshall's decease, and the payments consequential thereon, ought to have been confined to the personal estate and effects of Robert Marshall.

After the report had been made, the Defendant Crookes filed several exceptions thereto, and thereby, amongst other things, insisted, that the Master ought not to have brought the several sums amounting to £2253, 4s. 10d. into account, for that the payments were not made on account, of Robert Marshall's personal estate, but on account of his real estate, and the decree did not authorize any account thereof to be taken.

The cause now came on for rehearing and on the exceptions.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh, for the Defendant Crookes, claimed the right to begin.

Mr. Kindersley, contra, for the Plaintiff.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The Defendant Crookes has the right of reply on his exceptions: he therefore is entitled to begin on the exceptions.

As to the rehearing, the objection to the decree is either one of want of parties or to a part only of the decree. In either case the Defendant will be entitled to reply. The Defendant must therefore begin.

[260] Mr. Pemberton Leigh and Mr. Montagu, for the Defendant, then contended that either the decree or the Master's finding must be erroneous, for if the decree warranted the accounts of the produce of the real estate, then it was wrong, being made in the absence of the heir at law: and, on the other hand, that if it did not warrant such account, then that the Master was wrong in including the £1253, 4s. 10d. in his report.

Mr. Kindersley, Mr. G. Turner, and Mr. Parry, for the Plaintiff, argued that the decree did not direct any account of the real estate. That the bill was not for the administration of the estate, but one for an account by a principal against his agent, and that it mattered not from what source the receipts of the agent on account of his principal had been derived.

Dec. 22. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. I have read the pleadings in this case, and I am of opinion that the bill neither required, nor in any way entitled the Plaintiff to a decree for the administration of the estate of the testator Robert Marshall, received by the Defendant Crookes and his deceased partner Thomas Todd.

The bill is not expressed with the clearness and precision which might have been wished, but Todd & Co. having been the agents and consignees of the testator in his lifetime, and of his trustees and executors after his death, the object of the bill was, to have, as against Crookes the surviving partner and against Todd the executor of the deceased partner, an account of the receipts and payments of Todd & Co., as such agents and consignees.

[261] If there had been greater doubt than there is upon the bill, such doubt would have been removed by the answer of Mr. Crookes and the first schedule thereto, which, with great clearness and propriety, set forth the nature of the transactions and accounts between Todd & Co., as the agents of Marshall in his lifetime, and of his Jamaica executors after his death.

It appears, that the executors in Jamaica, not only made to Todd & Co. consignments on account of the crops and produce of the estate, but also remittances on account of the monies arising from the sale of the estates, under the direction of the testator's will. The bill for some reason which has not been explained, in praying an account of the receipts from Todd & Co. after the testator's death, asks only for an account of all sums of money received by them on account of his personal estate subsequently to his death. The bill, however, specifically states several sums as having been received by Todd & Co., during their agency, from the executors, and the sums specifically stated amount, in the whole, to the sum of £2253, 4s. 10d. The bill does not state that these sums were parts of the purchase-money arising from the sale of the real estate; but it distinctly appears from the answer, that they were received on account of such purchase-money. There was no amendment, either of the statements or of the prayer of the bill, on that account; and the decree of the Court of Exchequer, in conformity with the prayer of the bill, directs the Master to take an account of all and singular the dealings and transactions in the bill mentioned between Todd & Co. and Robert Marshall deceased, and of all sums of money received by them on his account in his lifetime, and of all and singular the said dealings and transactions with [262] them, and of all sums of money received by them on account of his personal estate since his decease.

The Master, in his report, stated the nature of the account, and that it continued to be an account current up to the death of Thomas Todd, and that the several sums amounting together to the sum of £2253, 4s. 10d. were received by Todd & Co., and were entered to the credit of the estate of Robert Marshall in the same account current, and were payments on account of the purchase-money for the Ridge estate.

Before the Master's report was made, the Defendant Crookes, having ascertained that the Master intended to charge him with the purchase-money which Todd & Co. had received and entered to the credit of Robert Marshall's estate, presented a petition of rehearing, alleging that he was aggrieved by the decree, and submitted that the cause ought to have been ordered to stand over, with liberty for the Plaintiff to amend his bill by adding parties thereto, or that the accounts, by the decree directed to be taken, of the dealings and transactions with Todd & Co. since Robert Marshall's decease, and the payments consequential thereon, ought to have been confined to the personal estate and effects of Robert Marshall.

After the report was made, the Defendant Crookes filed several exceptions thereto, and thereby, amongst other things, insisted that the Master ought not to have brought the several sums amounting to £2253, 4s. 10d. into account, for that the payments were not made on account of Robert Marshall's personal estate, but on account of his real estate, and the decree did not authorize any account thereof to be taken.

[263] The petition of rehearing and the exceptions are brought on together, and the Defendant Crookes puts his case, as to the £2253, 4s. 10d., thus:—He says the decree either directs the account of these purchase-monies to be taken, or it does not; that if it does, the decree is erroneous, and he desires to have it varied on a rehearing, and if he can obtain a rehearing, he submits to have the exceptions overruled. On the other hand, he alleges, that if the decree does not authorize an account of these purchase-monies to be taken, the report is erroneous, and he claims the benefit of his exceptions, and submits to have the petition of rehearing dismissed.

It appears, that the testator Robert Marshall, by his will, directed his executors in Jamaica, to sell his real and personal estate in Jamaica, and remit the proceeds to Great Britain, to his executors there, and by the accounts it appears, that the executors in Jamaica made their remittances to England, including the proceeds of the real estate in Jamaica, to the house of Todd & Co., who had been the consignees and correspondents of the testator, in his lifetime. The remittances being made by the executors in Jamaica, were intended for the executors in England; and it appears from the will, as well as from the nature of the transactions between the parties, that the consignees and correspondents in England, by whom the remittances were received, were, and considered themselves to be, accountable to the executors in England, one of whom was a partner in the firm of Todd & Co., and the other is the Plaintiff in this cause.

I do not now understand why the word personal estate was introduced into the prayer of the bill, and into the decree. It could not have been intended by [264] the Plaintiff to exclude from the accounts the very sums of which the receipt was charged by the bill; and if there had been any doubt as to these sums being intended, by the decree, to be included in the account, it might perhaps have been proper to vary the decree, by removing such doubt, and directing that the sums specifically mentioned in the bill, and which by the answer appear to have been proceeds of real estate, should be included in the account; but I am of opinion, that no such variation as is asked by the petition of rehearing ought to be made. It does not appear to me that any additional parties are required, or that the sums in question ought to be excluded from the account. For these reasons, I think that the petition of rehearing must be dismissed, and, for the like reasons, I think that the exceptions, if they are all grounded upon the objection that the sums amounting to £2253, 4s. 10d. are brought into the account, must be overruled.

[264] TROTTER v. WALMESLEY. Jan. 25, 1844.

The preliminary accounts of the testator's estate, debts, &c., being directed upon motion, it was ordered that the creditors who should not come in should be excluded the benefit of the order.

Mr. Turner and Mr. Jervis moved for a reference to the Master to make certain preliminary enquiries under the 5th Order of the 9th of May 1839. (Ord. Can. 136.) It was asked that the Master should ascertain the children of the testator, and, if found to be parties to the suit, then that he should proceed to take the accounts and advertise for creditors. They proposed that the order should contain a direction that the creditors who should not come in should be excluded from the benefit of the order.

[266] Mr. Cooke, contra, argued that the latter clause ought to be omitted. In Hornby v. Hunter (1 Russ. 97) it was decided, that though an enquiry as to debts had been made before decree, yet the decree at the original hearing must nevertheless direct an account of debts; and in Teague v. Richards (11 Sim. 46), although an order for preliminary accounts and enquiries had been obtained in a suit for administering a testator's estate, yet the Court would not, on that account, restrain a creditor from suing the executors at law.

Mr. Turner, in reply, said that Hornby v. Hunter did not apply, it being a case before the New Orders.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. Teague v. Richards merely shews that preliminary enquiries were not, as against a creditor desirous of proceeding at law, considered to be of the same authority as a decree.

By inserting the clause in question there will be this advantage, that if the accounts are properly taken, an order for payment of the debts may be made at once by the original decree.

It was accordingly ordered, in the event of the proper parties being before the Court, that the Master should cause advertisements for the creditors of the testator to come in and prove their debts, and he was to fix a peremptory day for that purpose; and it was ordered "that such of the said creditors as should not come in and prove their debts by the day so to be limited, were to be excluded from the benefit of this order." (Reg. Lib. 1843, B. fol. 537.)

[266] ROBERTS v. JONES. April 15, July 3, 1844.

A Defendant filed a plea, but the Plaintiff neither set it down, nor took any steps for three terms. The bill was, on motion, dismissed with costs.

The Defendant, on the 23d of September 1843, filed a plea to the whole bill, but the Plaintiff did not set it down within three weeks, nor did he, in fact, ever set it down.

On the 21st of January 1844 the Defendant moved ex parte, that the Plaintiff might pay the costs of the plea and of the suit; but the Court then thought, that the Plaintiff ought to have notice of the motion, and have an opportunity of undertaking to reply. (7 Beavan, 57.)

On the 15th of April 1844 no step having been taken by the Plaintiff, Mr. Simons, for the Defendant, moved that the Plaintiff's bill might be dismissed, the Plaintiff having submitted to the plea. He referred to the 35th Order of the 26th of August 1841 (Ord. Can. 175), by which it is ordered, "That where the Defendant shall file a plea to the whole or part of a bill, the plea shall be held good, to the same extent and for the same purposes as a plea allowed upon argument, unless the Plaintiff shall, within three weeks from the expiration of the time allowed for filing such plea, cause the same to be set down for argument, and the Plaintiff shall be held to have submitted thereto."

[267] The Plaintiff not appearing, the order was made.

The registrar declined drawing up the order for dismissal, on the ground that it could not be done until the expiration of three terms from the time of filing the plea.

On the 3d of July 1844, three terms having expired,

Mr. Simons moved that the bill might stand dismissed with costs.

The Plaintiff not appearing,

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] made the order.

NOTE.—See Daniel's Orders, p. 76.

[267] MATHER v. SHELMERDINE. Jan. 11, 1844.

Pauper order discharged, the particular circumstances, tending to shew that the Plaintiff was not a pauper not being specifically denied.

The Plaintiff in this cause obtained, in November 1843, an order to sue in form pauperis, on the usual affidavit that he was not worth £5, his wearing apparel and the subject-matter of this suit excepted.

Mr. Follett now moved to dispauper the Plaintiff, upon affidavits which shewed that the Plaintiff had been for two years and was now carrying on the trade [268] of coach builder at Manchester, employing journeymen under him; and that he was "now possessed of a carriage, trade implements, furniture, and other goods worth £20 and upwards."

The Plaintiff, in reply, swore, that he had "been out of a situation for some time past, and was unable to earn sufficient to support himself and family, and would be glad to obtain £3 or £4 for all the furniture and working tools in his possession." He repeated "that he was not worth more than £5 over and above his wearing apparel."

There were other affidavits, shewing, but in general terms, the great poverty and destitution of the Plaintiff.

It appeared from affidavits in reply that, in July 1842, he had received £44 as a legacy.

Mr. Willcock, contra.

See Romilly v. Grint (2 Beav. 186), and Boddington v. Woodley (5 Beav. 555).

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I must discharge the order, and I proceed, on the omission of the Plaintiff, to answer the affidavit in support of the motion. The affidavits of the Plaintiff are no answer at all to what is stated by the Defendants; and I should act contrary to the established rules of the Court if I permitted the Plaintiff to continue to sue as a pauper.

[269] It is not because a man is poor that he is to be relieved from all the costs, but he must be poor to the extent and in the real sense of the affidavit.

Discharge the order with costs.

Affirmed 22d May 1844 by the Lord Chancellor.

[S. C. 13 L. J. Ch. 135; 8 Jur. 50.]

When, at the time of amending his bill, the Plaintiff has changed his residence, it should be stated by amendment; and this may be done notwithstanding the rule that subsequent facts are the proper subject of supplement and not of amendment. Pending the suit, the infant Plaintiffs and their next friend went abroad, and upon a subsequent amendment the fact was not noticed. A motion for security for costs was refused, there being no wilful intention to mislead, the residence abroad not being permanent, and no danger of losing the costs being suggested.

This bill was filed in December 1842, by two infants, by Mrs. Farley, their grandmother, as their next friend.

The infants and their next friend were originally resident in Canada; but came to this country in order to prosecute this suit. They were properly described in the original bill, as resident at St. Michael's Place, Brompton. The Defendant having put in his answer, the bill was amended on the 22d of November 1843, but no alteration was made in the address of the Plaintiffs and their next friend.

It was now moved, on the behalf of the Defendant, that the next friend might give security for costs, on the ground that the amended bill contained a misdescription of the present residence of the Plaintiffs and of their next friend; they being, now and at the time of the filing [270] of the amended bill, resident abroad. It appeared that in January 1843 the infants and their next friend removed from Brompton to Kennington, and that in June 1843 the infants went to Boulogne for the purpose of education, where they had since remained. The next friend also went "temporarily" to Boulogne, for the purpose of occasionally seeing her grandchildren, and was staying there with her daughter, in lodgings at an hotel.

Mr. Gordon, in support of the motion, argued, that as the next friend had thought fit to misdescribe the residence of the Plaintiffs and of herself in the amended bill, and to live out of the jurisdiction, she ought to give security for costs. Sandys v. Long (2 Myl. & K. 487), Simpson v. Burton (1 Beav. 556, and see Wray v. Hutchinson, 3 Myl. & K. 235).

Mr. Rogers, contrâ. The address of the Plaintiffs and their next friend was perfectly correct in the original bill. It was unnecessary, and would have been improper to have inserted, by amendment, a fact which took place after the filing of the original bill, and which was therefore properly supplemental.

The parties are resident abroad only for a temporary purpose; there has been no intention of misleading the Defendant, and it is not sworn that any danger is apprehended of losing the costs. The Defendant has also, by acquiescence, waived any irregularity.

Mr. Gordon, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The description of the residence was correct at the [271] time of the filing of the bill, but became inaccurate by the subsequent change of residence. Though by the rules of pleading you ought not to insert in an amended bill allegations of facts which have occurred subsequent to the filing of the bill, yet that rule does not appear to me to apply to the description of the residence of the Plaintiff, and I think that the Plaintiffs ought, by the amended bill, to have stated the actual residence of themselves and their next friend: however, the continuing the old address was an error which they might easily have fallen into.

There does not appear to have been any wilful intention to mislead; and though the next friend is now resident abroad, it appears that it is her intention to return, though the affidavit is somewhat vague as to the time when. There is no suggestion that the Defendant apprehends that there is any danger of his losing the costs.

I must refuse this application; but, under the circumstances, without costs, and without prejudice to any further application which the Defendant may be advised to make on the subject.

[271] GREEN v. BADLEY. GREEN v. TOMPSON. Jan. 23, Feb. 17, 1844.

On the application of the Plaintiffs a Six Clerk was appointed guardian ad litem for a Defendant, who was stated to be an infant, but was in reality of full age. A decree was made and the accounts taken on that footing. Held, that the proceedings were not binding on him, and the Plaintiffs were ordered to pay the costs of the Six Clerk.

This bill was filed in 1827 by two residuary legatees against the executors and trustees, and against the other residuary legatees, for the purpose of administering the estate of the testator. One of the parties interested in the residue was the Defendant John Tompson the younger.

By an order, made upon the motion of the Plaintiffs and on notice to the other parties, Mr. Vesey, the senior Six Clerk not towards the cause, was appointed guardian of the Defendant John Tompson the younger, who was stated to be an infant, for the purpose of putting in his answer, and by whom he might defend the suit. Mr. Vesey accordingly put in a common infant's answer, submitting his rights and interests to the protection of the Court.

The cause came on in 1829, when Mr. Vesey appeared for the Defendant John Tompson the younger, and a decree was made, under which the accounts and other proceedings were taken in the Master's office.

In November 1842 the cause came on for hearing on further directions, when it appeared that John Tompson the younger, though treated as an infant throughout the proceedings had, at the institution of the suit, and at the time of the appointment of guardian, attained his age of twenty-one, and was upwards of thirty years of age.

The proceedings having been thus found to be defective, the Court gave leave to the Plaintiffs to file a supplemental bill, for the purpose of supplying the defect.

A supplemental bill was accordingly filed by the Plaintiffs, praying that they might have the benefit of the decree and proceedings as against John Tompson the younger, with liberty for him to surcharge and falsify the accounts of the trustees and executors, or that the decree made in the original cause might be [273] made in the present cause, and that all proper accounts and inquiries might be directed.

The trustees and executors submitted that their accounts ought not again to be taken, and insisted that John Tompson the younger had acquiesced in the former proceedings.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Lloyd, for the Plaintiffs, argued that John Tompson the younger was bound by acquiescence: that every opportunity had been given and would be given him to examine the accounts, and that no possible good could arise from taking them again.

Mr. Spence and Mr. Bazalgette, for John Tompson the younger, argued that he was not bound by the proceedings which had taken place in his absence.

Mr. Purvis and Mr. Renshaw, for the executors and trustees, insisted, that having regularly passed their accounts, in the presence of parties interested, and by whom they had been strictly scrutinised, they ought not to be retaken.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS said, that the proceedings in the cause having really taken place in the absence of John Tompson the younger were not binding on him; that the accounting parties were still liable to him, and that he might now file a bill to have the accounts taken again in his presence; but though the executors could not protect themselves from the claim of that Defendant, they might still refuse to account again to the Plaintiffs and the other persons in whose presence the accounts had already been taken. The difficulties, he added, were such, that the parties had better come to some [274] reasonable arrangement, which would prevent a very serious expense, and which, in all probability, would produce no good whatever to any party.

The cause stood over, and an arrangement was ultimately made for the payment of the costs of John Tompson the younger out of the Plaintiffs' share of the fund, and he then agreed to be bound by the previous proceedings.

Feb. 17. Mr. Romilly asked for the costs of Mr. Vesey.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Lloyd, contra.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale], being of opinion that the irregular proceedings had arisen from the negligence of the Plaintiffs, ordered them to pay the costs.

[274] GREEN v. BADLEY. Feb. 13, 14, 1844.

A case of breach of trust was alleged on the pleadings against trustees and executors for not having sold an estate, but at the first hearing the common accounts only were directed. Held, on further directions, that the Defendants could not be then charged with the breach of trust, and that inquiries could not be then directed with that object.

The testator devised his Sedgley Hall estate to his trustees in fee, on trust, that they should "within two years next after his decease, or so soon afterwards as they should be satisfied as to the quantity, quality, and nature of the mines and minerals, if any, lying in or under all, or any part or parts of the said lands and premises, or such other time afterwards, as they or [275] he, in their or his discretion, should think proper, absolutely sell and dispose of the said messuage," &c., and out of the proceeds, until the sale, and the produce of the sale, to pay the charges, and a debt of £1400 on certain trusts, and divide the residue as therein mentioned. . . . he appointed his trustees his executors.

The testator died in 1814.

This bill was filed in 1827 by some parties interested in the residue, praying the establishment of the will, the execution of the trusts, and the accounts of the real and personal estate received by the trustees, or which, "without their wilful default, might have been received."

The bill charged, that the trustees ought to have ascertained the mines and minerals under the estate, and ought to have proceeded to a sale thereof; that they had not proceeded to ascertain the mines, &c., until very lately, when they bored the said estate for that purpose, and that they had never taken any steps to have the said estate sold.

The cause was heard in July 1831, when a decree was made establishing the will, declaring the trusts ought to be performed, and directing accounts of the real and personal estate to be taken, and the Master was directed to enquire, whether it would be for the benefit of all parties interested in the Sedgley Hall estate that the same should be sold, reserving the mines and minerals.

The Master proceeded to take the accounts; but such of the parties interested in the produce of the estate as had been infants, having all become adult, he did not [276] proceed in the enquiry respecting it. He made his report, and when the cause came on for further directions, the estate had not been sold.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Lloyd, for the Plaintiffs, sought to charge the trustees for a breach of trust, in not having taken proper steps for ascertaining the minerals and selling the estate within a reasonable period. With that view they asked for enquiries.

Mr. Turner and Mr. Harwood, and Mr. Spence and Mr. Bazalgette, for parties in the same interest.

Mr. Purvis and Mr. Renshaw, contra, contended, that the point having been raised by the pleadings, the Plaintiffs could not, after the decree which had been made, extend the relief so as to charge the trustees and executors in the way proposed.

Mr. Lloyd, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. That the trusts of this will have not been duly carried into execution according to the intention of the testator admits of no doubt. The question now is, whether the trustees are to be charged with any of the consequences of the undue execution of the trusts. Considering that the testator directed, by his will, that the estates devised should be sold, that he died in 1814, and that we are now in the year 1844, and no sale has been made; considering further the mode in which this suit has been prosecuted, it cannot be matter of surprise that the parties interested in the estate are discontented, and should exert themselves to charge the trustees. The question is, whether on the present [277] occasion and in the present suit, they can be lawfully charged.

The testator, by his will, directed that the estate and minerals should be sold by the trustees "within two years from the time of his death, or as soon afterwards as they or he should be satisfied as to the quantity, quality, and nature of the mines and minerals (if any) in or under all or any part or parts of the said lands and premises, or at such other time or times afterwards as they in their discretion should think proper." It has been much discussed, whether this is an absolute direction to the trustees to sell, or one depending on their proceeding to ascertain the quantity and quality of the minerals. It is not, however, necessary to decide it. The estate was not sold when the bill was filed in 1827; and though it appears that some previous attempt had been made to bore in these fields to discover the existence of minerals, yet it does not appear to have been effectual or to have turned to any good account.

This bill distinctly alleges, that the estate ought to have been sold, that the trustees ought to have proceeded to ascertain the quantity and quality of the minerals, and it states they have not done so. The Defendants in their answer admit that they have not done so. The very things, therefore, which are now dwelt upon at such length, appeared on the pleadings at the original hearing.

The cause came on to be heard, and what was done? Was there any declaration that the trustees ought to have proceeded to a sale? So far from it, the Court took notice that there had been no sale, and referred it to the Master to ascertain whether it would be for the benefit of all parties that a sale should take place. The Court therefore had before it upon the [278] pleadings this charge, and there were, at the hearing, persons capable of impeaching the conduct of the trustees in respect of it, yet they obtain this decree for an account scarcely differing from the most ordinary decree. When the parties came to take the accounts in the Master's office, the Master was not satisfied with the Plaintiffs being represented by the same solicitor as the Defendants, and directed the proceedings to be conducted by another solicitor, who became charged with the protection of the interest of the Plaintiffs; he had an opportunity of ascertaining what were the points in issue, and if he found that they were not properly put in issue, so as to enable his clients to obtain all the relief he thought them entitled to, he might, by the leave of the Court, have brought forward fresh charges by supplemental bill; but what he did was to adopt the proceedings, and to proceed to carry into execution the decree as he found it. I do not say that he was guilty of any neglect, but he could not act thus and afterwards claim other relief. If, from new circumstances, he considered his clients entitled to further or different relief, he ought to have come forward with a proper application to enable them to have it. I am of opinion that the Plaintiffs must be considered as having adopted the whole proceedings. I must consider this case as prosecuted by the same solicitor from beginning to end, and that the Plaintiffs are not entitled to any relief different from that given by the original decree and consequent thereon. By that decree the common and ordinary account was directed, and the Defendants could never have imagined that it was open to the Plaintiffs to have any such relief against them as that which is now asked. I do not think, under the circumstances, I ought to direct any such inquiry as that which is sought, for the purpose of charging the Defendants with the loss.

[279] GREENWOOD v. ROTHWELL. Feb. 13, 1844.

[For other proceedings, see 6 Beav. 492; 7 Beav. 291.]

An estate subject to a mortgage was devised to executors for a term for payment of debts and subject thereto, to one for life, with remainder over. The executors joined in a transfer of the mortgage, and raised a further sum alleged to be necessary for payment of the debts. The tenant for life, with the concurrence of the executors, afterwards sold the property absolutely, and the purchaser paid off the mortgage. A bill being filed by the remainder-man to redeem the purchaser, on payment of the original mortgage only, and the cause being set down on an objection for want of parties: Held, that the Plaintiff was not, at present, bound to make the executors parties.

Costs of setting down a cause on an objection for want of parties reserved to the hearing.

The testator being seised of some property at Clayton, subject to a mortgage for £400 to Duckett, secured by a term of 1000 years, made his will in 1811, whereby he gave as follows:—"I will and direct that all my just debts, funeral expenses, the costs and charges of proving and registering this my will, and also the several legacies hereinafter by me bequeathed shall be paid and satisfied by my trustees and executors hereinafter named, out of my real and personal estate," and, after giving a legacy and annuity, he devised to Joseph Greenwood and James Northrop, their executors, &c., all his lands, tenements, &c., for the term of 1000 years, on trust to keep the premises in repair, to keep down the mortgage, and pay the residue to Ann Bentley for life, and subject as aforesaid, he gave the property in question to Jonas Greenwood for life, with remainder to his issue (as purchasers) as tenants in common in fee, and he appointed Joseph Greenwood and James Northrop executors.

The testator died soon after, and, at his death, Jonas Greenwood had several children living. The executors proved his will.

By an indenture, made in 1812, between Duckett of the first part, the executors of the testator of the second part, and Mann of the third part, reciting that £406 was due on the mortgage, and that the executors had requested Mann to lend them the sum of £550, as well [280] to enable them to pay off the said sum of £406 as also to enable them to discharge sundry other just debts, amounting together to the sum of £144, which remained owing to other creditors of the testator, the property in question was conveyed by Duckett and the executors, for and during all the then residue and remainder of the several and respective terms of years therein, subject to redemption on payment of £550.

In 1823 Jonas Greenwood, the tenant for life, agreed to sell the premises to Abraham Tempest for £400, and by deed dated March 1823, in consideration of £400 paid by Abraham Tempest to Mann in satisfaction of his mortgage, and for a nominal consideration, the property was absolutely conveyed by Mann and Jonas Greenwood and by Joseph Greenwood and James Northrop, the executors, to Tempest in fee. The mortgage term was assigned in trust for the purchaser, and the term of 1000 years created by the will was merged. Jonas Greenwood further assured the property to Tempest by fine with proclamations. Tempest laid out a large sum of money on the property; and in 1826 he mortgaged it to Messrs. Rawson, and in 1835 Tempest and Messrs. Rawson, in consideration of £3000, conveyed the property absolutely to the Defendant Rothwell.

Jonas Greenwood died in 1840, and his children thereupon filed this bill insisting that he was tenant for life only, and seeking to redeem on payment of the mortgage of £400 and interest. It was decided on a former occasion that Jonas Greenwood was merely tenant for life. (See 6 Beav. 492.)

The Defendant, by his answer, raised three objections for want of parties, two of which having been submitted [281] to by the Plaintiffs, it is unnecessary to state them. The third was as follows:—"That if the Plaintiffs should be decreed to be entitled to any right or relief in the premises, then the proper accounts ought to be taken of and concerning the said testator's estate and debts, and other matters connected therewith, in the presence of all the necessary parties to such accounts."

The cause was set down on the objection for want of parties, under the 39th Order of August 1841. (Ord. Can. 175.)

Mr. Turner and Mr. Thomas Turner, for the Plaintiffs. The real and personal representatives of the testator are not necessary parties to the suit. It is not suggested that any debt or legacy now remains unpaid. Where executors having a power to mortgage for payment of debts exercise it, the Court has never held that they were necessary parties to a redemption suit, unless the equity of redemption is limited to them. You cannot combine a suit to administer an estate with a suit for redemption. Pearse v. Hewitt (7 Sim. 471).

Mr. Roupell and Mr. Rogers, for the Defendant. The trustees and executors are necessary parties to this suit. The Plaintiffs claim subject to the debts and legacies, and are entitled to nothing until they are paid. The Defendant insists that the executors and trustees have properly sold under the powers contained in the will: if the Plaintiffs dispute the validity of the acts of the executors, such executors should be brought here to contest that allegation.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The testator, by his will, charged his real estate, [282] which was subject to a mortgage, with the payment of his debts, and created a term of 1000 years, by means of which the amount was to be raised by his trustees and executors. It does not appear that anything was raised by virtue of this devised term; but after the testator's death, the trustees and executors joined in a transfer of the mortgage, and they on the same occasion raised an additional sum of £144, which it was stated was necessary for enabling them to discharge sundry debts of the testator. I do not mean to deny that Rothwell may be entitled to credit for any portion of the money which may have been applied in payment of the testator's debts. Supposing that to be so, it will form part of Rothwell's defence to the suit. He has a right to say to the Plaintiffs, "You are not entitled to redeem me on payment of £400, because a further sum of £144 has been raised and applied in payment of the debts of the testator." But has the Defendant a right to insist that this matter shall be brought forward by the Plaintiffs, whose claim is to have the estate subject only to the mortgage for £400? I think not, for this is part of Rothwell's defence, which the Plaintiffs are not bound to bring forward.

The question of costs was discussed, and Osborne v. Foreman (2 Hare, 656), was cited.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS said he should reserve the costs until the hearing, when he should be better able to see into the real merits of the case.

[283] BELL v. DUNMORE. Nov. 25, 1843; Jan. 11, 1844.

Liberty given to file a supplemental answer to correct a date in the original answer.

On such an application the Defendant must account for the mistake, and the truth of the proposed answer, and the terms in which it is intended to file it, must be verified.

This was an application for leave to file a supplemental answer to correct an alleged erroneous date in the original answer.

The following is an outline of the case:—

In October 1826, Mr. Ord and the Plaintiff Mr. Bell, as his surety, executed a bond for £2000 to a Mr. Marston.

The firm of Shuttleworth, Ingram & Wartnaby (the Defendant), were concerned in the transaction for Ord and Marston. Marston died, and Wartnaby and Dunmore, his executors, having commenced proceedings at law on the bond against Bell, he filed this bill, to restrain the action and to be relieved from the bond, on the ground, first, that time having been given to the principal debtor, the surety had been thereby released; and, secondly, that payments had been made by the principal on account.

The bill alleged, that the solicitors were aware "that the £2000 was for the sole use of Ord, and that the Plaintiff received no part thereof, and joined in the bond to secure the payment of the £2000 solely as a surety for Ord, and the £2000 was received by Messrs. Shuttleworth, Ingram & Wartnaby, as the solicitors and agents of Ord, and applied by them, on his account; a large portion of it being retained by them in payment of debts and bills of costs due by him to the said firm, or the individual partners therein."

[284] The Defendants Dunmore and Wartnaby, by their answer, admitted the negotiation for the loan and the giving the bond in October 1826; and Wartnaby stated and Dunmore said he had been informed and believed, though he did not know the same of his own knowledge ["that the said sum of £2000 was paid by Marston to Shuttleworth in two instalments of £500 and £1500 in the months of April and October 1827; and that the said sum of £500 was paid by Shuttleworth, as the solicitor of both parties, to the Defendant Ord in the month of April 1827; and that the said sum of £1500 was, in the month of October 1827, carried over from the credit of Marston in account with the said firm of Shuttleworth, Ingram & Wartnaby, to the credit of Ord with the said firm"].

A motion was now made that the Defendants might be at liberty to file a supplemental answer, for the purpose of correcting a mistake in their answer, by substituting 1826 for 1827 in the above-mentioned paragraph which is contained between brackets. The notice of motion stated in terms the proposed supplemental answer.

The affidavit, in support of the motion, stated that the Defendants had made an unintentional mistake as to the date, the year 1827 having been by mistake inserted for 1826. That the date had been correctly stated in the original instructions for the answer, but, by mistake, incorrectly stated in the further instructions.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Faber, in support of the motion.

[285] They cited Strange v. Collins (2 Ves. & B. 163), Tidswell v. Bowyer (7 Sim. 64), White v. Sayer (5 Sim. 566).

They cited Greenwood v. Atkinson (4 Sim. 54).

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. At present I am not able either to refuse or grant the application. The object of the Court is to allow neither party to obtain a victory at the expense of truth. There must be an affidavit of the truth of the intended answer and of the terms in which it is proposed to file it. The motion must stand over for a further affidavit.

Jan. 11, 1844. A further affidavit was produced in accordance with the requisition of the Court, and the motion was now renewed.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Faber, in support of the motion.

Mr. G. Turner and Mr. Bates, contra.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. One question in this case is, when the consideration for this bond was paid. It is stated in the answer to have been in 1827; but, upon an examination of the entries in the books and documents, it is now distinctly sworn that this was a mistake, and that this took place [286] in 1826. When the cause comes on for hearing it will be important to ascertain whether it was in 1826 or 1827.

I should be sorry to let fall a word which might imply that the Court considers it a trifling matter to allow a party who has solemnly declared one thing, to put in a second answer quite inconsistent with his former solemn statement. I have felt it necessary to require the party not only to account for the mistake, but to produce the answer in the very terms and words he pledges himself to swear it. Not being satisfied on a former occasion the case stood over.

The Defendant, in a case like this, must shew that the fact alleged to be erroneous is material: that the error arose under such circumstances as not to fix him with the first statement; and he must also shew the terms in which he proposes to introduce the new allegation. (See Haslar v. Hollis, 2 Beavan, 236; Smith v. Hartley, 5 Beavan, 432, and Whitcombe v. Minchin, 1 Wilson, C. C. 1.)

If it appeared that this gentleman, in making the first statement on oath, had been speculating in his defence, and was now endeavouring to fit the allegations on the record with the evidence which he has since, from time to time, picked up, or if he came forward under circumstances which plainly shewed that he had been guilty of extraordinary negligence or temerity in pledging his oath to a particular statement, I might hesitate before I granted the application. When the proper time arrives, the matters now alleged will deserve serious attention, and may then hang heavily on the Defendant; but at present I cannot come to a conclusion on them.

[287] I do not say what would be the effect of the new statement. The Defendant has said that the payment was made in 1827, and if now, by leave of the Court, he be permitted to state that it took place in 1826, these two inconsistent statements will remain on record, and when the cause comes on for hearing, the effect of them will have to be considered.

It is to be observed that if the new allegation be introduced, the Plaintiff will have a full opportunity of amending his bill and of interrogating the Defendant as to all those new facts and circumstances with a view of throwing discredit on the new allegation. On the whole, it appears to me that the danger of doing injustice will be greater by refusing than by granting the application. The Defendant must, therefore, have the indulgence he asks upon payment of all the costs.

FORM OF ORDER.—After reciting that it had been moved that the Defendants might be at liberty to file a supplemental answer to the Plaintiff's bill for the purpose of correcting an error in the clause in their answer to the said bill, beginning in the 55th folio of the said answer, and ending in the 67th folio of the said answer, and which clause was in the words, &c. [stating it], "his Lordship doth order that the Defendants Dunmore and Wartnaby be at liberty to file a supplemental answer to the Plaintiff's bill, in the form of the draft signed by counsel and referred to in the affidavit of the Defendant Wartnaby, sworn, &c., as the exhibit marked with the letter A. And it is ordered that the Defendants pay the costs," &c.

[See Butler v. Butler, 1885, 16 Q. B. D. 377.]

Property was given in trust "for the sole and absolute use" of a female infant. She afterwards married under age, and a settlement was made giving half to the wife for her separate use, and the other half to the husband. A bill was filed by the husband and wife, after the latter had come of age, against the trustees, seeking to charge them with a breach of trust. The Court thought the frame of the suit improper, but gave leave to amend; and the wife being, by amendment, made to sue by her next friend, a decree was made.

After publication, a bill filed by husband and wife was amended by making the wife sue by her next friend. Held, that the evidence was still receivable.

The testator, by his will dated in 1819, devised, &c., some real and personal estate to trustees, upon trust "for the sole and absolute use of his daughter Mary Ann Prout," in case she should attain twenty-one, with maintenance in the meantime, and with a gift over in case she should die before she attained twenty-one.

The testator died shortly after.

In 1839 the Plaintiff Mr. Davis married Mary Ann Prout, then a minor, and a settlement was thereupon made, whereby they covenanted to convey the property of Mary Ann Prout to trustees, upon trust, as to one moiety, to the separate use of Mary Ann for life, and as to the other half upon trust for Davis for life, with certain limitations to the children of the marriage.

Mary Ann Davis attained twenty-one in 1840, and in 1841 this bill was filed by Davis, his wife and the only child of the marriage, to make the trustees responsible for certain alleged breaches of trust.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh and Mr. Rogers, for the Plaintiffs.

Mr. Turner and Mr. Kinglake, and Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Tripp, for the Defendants, objected that no relief could be had upon the record as it was now [289] framed, for the property was held for the separate use of the wife, and therefore a suit in which the husband joined as Co-plaintiff could not be supported; Wals v. Parker (2 Keen, 59), Reeve v. Dalby (2 Sim. & St. 464). Here the property was given by the will "for the sole and absolute use" of Mrs. Davis, and this was equivalent to a gift for her separate use; Ex parte Ray (1 Mad. 199), — v. Lyne (Young, 562), 2 Roper on Husband and Wife, 164. That if there existed any question on the point, the interests of the husband and wife would be so conflicting, that they could not sue together as Co-plaintiffs.

That the settlement having been made during the infancy of the wife, was not binding on her; Simson v. Jones (2 Russ. & M. 374), Johnson v. Johnson (1 Keen, 649); and that therefore the whole property was still her separate estate.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh and Mr. Rogers, contra. The objection not having been taken by the answer, it is incompetent for the Defendants to insist on it at the present stage of the cause. Such technical objections may be valid if taken by demurrer, and yet the Court will not listen to them at the hearing, as in the instance of an objection for multifariousness. (See Wynne v. Callander, 1 Russ. 293; Greaves v. Churchill, 1 Myl. & K. 559.) In this case there is no misjoinder; for both the husband and wife have an independent interest in the fund, and a common interest to make the trustees responsible. When the fund has been recovered by this suit the Court will protect the interest of the wife. If the property were settled to the separate use of the wife by the [290] will so as to exclude the husband, still by the settlement, the husband has acquired an interest, and the wife has adopted the settlement after attaining twenty-one, which she had the power of doing, she being considered a feme sole, as to her separate estate.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. This is not the first time that this point has been raised before me. There can, however, be no doubt of the rule as now established. The difficulty in a suit constituted like the present is not so much in protecting the wife's interest against her husband, but because in such a record the suit is considered as that of the husband alone; and if this bill were now dismissed on the merits, the wife might the next day file another bill for the very same object, and would not be bound by the former decree; this is the ground on which the present objection is to be decided. Though I have some reason to think that the object of the Defendants is to delay, I cannot refuse to listen to their objection.

There must be leave given to the Plaintiffs to amend and set the record right.

Jan. 17, Feb. 13, 1844. The Plaintiffs amended their bill by adding Mr. Jackness as the next friend of the wife; but the husband was still continued as a Co-plaintiff. The cause again came on for hearing.

It was again objected, first, that from the frame of the record no decree could be made. The following cases were cited in opposition to this objection: Platel v. Craddock (C. P. Cooper, 469, 481), where a bill being filed by husband and [291] wife in respect of a trust fund limited to the wife for her separate use, remainder to the husband for life, liberty was given to amend by adding a next friend to the wife, and a decree was made; and England v. Downs (1 Beavan 96).

Secondly, it was objected that an alteration having taken place in the title of the suit, the evidence taken could not be now read; Bailey v. Dennett (3 You. & C. 461. And see Milligan v. Mitchell, 1 Myl. & Cr. 443, and 3 Myl. & Cr. 72; Giles v. Giles, 1 Keen, 685).

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS, after some hesitation, overruled the objections, admitted the evidence, and made a decree.

[291] GREENWOOD v. ROTHWELL. (Ex relatione.) March 14, 1844.

[S. C. 13 L. J. Ch. 226. For other proceedings, see 6 Beav. 492; 7 Beav. 279.]

Order for the production of title-deeds of a mortgagee who also claimed to be a purchaser of the equity of redemption, refused.

This was a motion for the production of deeds and documents relating to some property which was the subject of the suit.

John Mitchell, having mortgaged the property for 1000 years for securing £400 and interest, by his will, dated in 1811, directed all his debts, funeral and testamentary expenses and legacies, to be paid out of his real and personal estate, and he devised unto Joseph Greenwood and J. Northrop, all his hereditaments, &c., for the term of 1000 years, upon trust to keep the premises in repair, to keep down the interest upon the mortgage, [292] and to apply the residue for the maintenance of Ann Bentley for life; and subject thereto, in effect, he devised the property in question unto Jonas Greenwood for life, and after his decease to his issue as purchasers (6 Beavan, 492), and he appointed Joseph Greenwood and Northrop his executors, who proved his will.

By an indenture dated the 5th of March 1812, and made between the mortgagees of the first part, Joseph Greenwood and Northrop of the second part, and Mann of the third part, after reciting the mortgage, and the will of the testator, and that Joseph Greenwood and Northrop had requested Mann to lend them £550, to enable them to pay off the sum of £406 due upon the mortgage; and also to enable them to discharge sundry other just debts, amounting together to the sum of £144, which remained owing to other creditors of the testator, it was witnessed, that, in consideration of £406 paid to the mortgagees, and of £144 paid to Joseph Greenwood and Northrop by Mann, they, the mortgagees, assigned, and Joseph Greenwood and Northrop assigned and confirmed, the property in question to Mann, for the residue of the several terms of years therein, discharged from the proviso for redemption contained in the mortgage, but subject to redemption on payment to Mann by Joseph Greenwood and Northrop of the sum of £550 with interest.

By deeds dated in March 1823, after reciting the mortgage to Mann, the will of the testator, and that Jonas Greenwood had agreed to sell the premises to Abraham Tempest for the sum of £400, it was witnessed, in consideration of £400 paid to Mann in discharge of his mortgage, and for the nominal consideration therein mentioned, the property was conveyed by Jonas Green-[293]-wood, Joseph Greenwood and Northrop to Tempest in fee, and Mann assigned the mortgage term of 1000 years upon trust for Tempest, and to attend the inheritance, and Joseph Greenwood and Northrop surrendered and merged the term of 1000 years created by the will of the testator.

Tempest afterwards expended considerable sums of money in building and in improving the premises.

By subsequent deeds, the property was conveyed to the Defendant Rothwell by way of mortgage to secure £3000, and the mortgage term of 1000 years was assigned to Alexander in trust for him, and to attend the inheritance.

The bill was filed by the children of Jonas Greenwood, praying a declaration, that under the will of John Mitchell, Jonas Greenwood took an estate for life only: that, subject thereto, the premises were limited to them as tenants in common in fee, and for a general declaration of the rights of the parties. It asked that Alexander might be declared a trustee for the Plaintiffs of the term of 1000 years, subject to such charge as Rothwell might be entitled to in respect of the mortgage for £400 due to Mann at the time of the conveyance to Tempest, and of any interest thereon, which the Plaintiffs offered to pay, and it prayed a conveyance to the Plaintiffs of the mortgage term of 1000 years.

The Defendant Rothwell, by his answer, said, he believed that the sum of £400 was, at the time of the purchase, the full value of the premises, that the purchase was made bona fide, and that the sale was made as a means of paying the debts of the testator, which, being charged upon the estate, authorized the trustees to sell [294] and make a good title to a purchaser. That the Plaintiff had acquiesced and permitted extensive improvements to be made upon the premises.

The Defendant also said that his mortgage contained other hereditaments than those claimed by the Plaintiffs, and insisted upon his right to retain the deeds. He also claimed to be a purchaser without notice, and insisted on the benefit of any want of notice in himself or others, and the benefit of the term of 1000 years vested in Alexander. The Defendant in a schedule set out the deeds, and insisted that until the Plaintiffs should establish their right to redemption, they were not entitled to any discovery or production of the title-deeds and documents prior to the will, nor to the production of the deeds or muniments relating to the mortgage.

Mr. G. Turner and Mr. T. Turner now moved for the production of the documents. The bill charges that the Defendant had notice of the Plaintiffs' claim; and the recitals in the several deeds shew, that the whole of the parties through whose hands the estate has passed must have had notice of the will of the testator, and of the title of the Plaintiffs. The cases of Hardman v. Ellames (2 Myl. & K. 732), and Bolton v. The Corporation of Liverpool (1 Myl. & K. 88), differ from the present; there the documents constituted the Defendant's title, without supporting that of the Plaintiff. Here the question is, whether the Defendant can protect himself by means of the term of 1000 years. At the utmost, the Defendant is only a mortgagee in respect of the original charge, with notice of the Plaintiffs' title, and this the Plaintiffs offer to pay. The mortgage made by the executors by [295] virtue of the will, had been discharged at the time of the purchase.

Mr. Roupell and Mr. Rogers argued, that the term of 1000 years created by the testator before his death had become vested in the Defendant for valuable consideration; and though Jonas Greenwood might be tenant for life only, still the Defendant was entitled to the estate during that term, as the trustees, for the purposes of the will, had a right to dispose of the estate for a term of 1000 years. That the £3000 borrowed of the Defendant upon the security of the property had been laid out in lasting improvements with the knowledge of the Plaintiffs. That the Defendant had no notice of the Plaintiffs' claim, and was entitled to withhold the deeds by virtue of his title as mortgagee until he has been fully paid.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] said, that, consistently with the established rules of the Court, he was unable to make the order for the production of the deeds. That the cause could not be ultimately disposed of without inquiry; and though the effect would be to prolong the litigation, still the Court was not at present in a condition to make the order.

[296] CASTLE v. EATE. Feb. 19, 20, April 1, 1844.

[S. C. 8 Jur. 280.]

Devise to trustees in fee, upon trust to demise until the testator's youngest child attained twenty-one, and during the minority of such youngest child, to pay the rents to the testator's wife, for the maintenance of herself and children, and when and so soon as the youngest surviving child should attain twenty-one, to sell and divide the produce "between and amongst the testator's wife and all his children who should be then living in equal shares." And in case of the death of any child before the estates became saleable, his children were to take his share. The children all died under twenty-one without issue.

Held, that the wife was entitled to the whole estate.

The testator, Joseph Starbuck, by his will, dated the 23d of December 1826, gave his real estates to trustees in fee, on trust to demise and let the same until his youngest child or his youngest surviving child should attain the age of twenty-one years, and during the minority of such youngest or youngest surviving child, to pay the rents (after deducting necessary outgoings) to his wife for the maintenance and support of herself and of his children; and in case of the decease of his wife in the meantime, the rents were to be applied by the trustees for the sole benefit of his children. And when, and so soon as the youngest, or the youngest surviving child should have attained the age of twenty-one years, the trustees were to sell the real estate, and after paying the charges thereon and the costs, they were to pay, divide, and distribute the residue of the purchase-money, unto, between, and amongst the testator's wife and all his children who should be then living, in equal shares and proportions, to and for their, his and their, own benefit. And he provided, that if any of his children should depart this life before the estates should become saleable, leaving issue, the children should take the share of his parent.

The testator died in 1827, leaving his wife and two children, Alfred and Maria, surviving him. The two children both of them died under twenty-one years of age, without issue. Maria on the 16th of September [297] 1839, and Alfred on the 20th of February 1842; and in consequence of that event the testator's customary estate was claimed on the one side by the widow, who had since married the Defendant Eate; and on the other, by John Starbuck, who was the testator's customary heir.

Mr. Turner and Mr. Metcalfe, for the Plaintiffs, the trustees.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. W. M. James, for the widow, argued that the words "then living," meaning at the time when the youngest child attained twenty-one, an event which could never happen, did not apply to the widow: that a share was, in effect devised to and became vested in her, at the testator's death, proportioned to the number of children then living, but which was capable of being enlarged, by the deaths of children without issue, before the youngest or the youngest surviving child attained twenty-one. That the gift was to a class, who, when ascertained, took as tenants in common; and in the event which happened, of all the children dying under twenty-one, there was no one to share with the widow, and therefore that she was entitled to the whole. That if it were said that the event had not happened on which the power of sale was to be exercised and the division to take place, then that the direction to demise would continue for ever, as the event on which it was to cease could never happen. That if she was not entitled to the whole, she must at least be entitled to the one-third, which became vested in her on the testator's death.

Mr. James Parker, for the customary heir, contended, that the only intent with which the testator directed a sale, was to divide the proceeds between his wife, and [298] at least some one child who had then attained twenty-one years of age, and that the only event on which a sale was to be made and the produce divided, was the attainment of twenty-one years of age by some one child, an event which had neither happened, nor could ever happen, all the children having died under age. That as the testator had not provided for the event which had really taken place, the devise failed, and that the customary heir was entitled to the estate.

Mr. Kindersley, in reply.

The following cases were cited: Manfield v. Dugard (1 Eq. Ca. Ab. 195), Fearne on Cont. Rem. 245, Goodtitle dem. Hayward v. Whitby (1 Burr. 228), Boraston's case (3 Rep. 19), Doe dem. Satterthwaite v. Satterthwaite (1 W. Black. Rep. 519), Balsford v. Kebbell (3 Ves. 363), Murray v. Tancred (10 Sim. 465), Leake v. Robinson (2 Mer. 363), Hanson v. Graham (6 Ves. 239), Doe dem. Hayter v. Joinville (3 East, 172).

April 1. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. Several cases were cited, but no one of them appears to be applicable to the present case.

The event which happened, of all the children dying under twenty-one years of age, does not appear to have been distinctly contemplated by the testator, and the question is, what is the question of the will under the circumstances?

[299] It is of no importance to say that he intended no benefit to the heir, who, if entitled at all, takes by descent, without regard to intention; but the wife and children were the objects of the testator's bounty, and the devise was clearly intended for their benefit. They were to take the benefit, by dividing the proceeds of the sale, and the sale was postponed till the youngest attained an age, when he could be competent to dispose of his share. In the meantime, all the rents were to be paid to the wife, for the support of herself and her children. If the wife died in the meantime, no provision is made as to any share which might have been supposed to have been given to her, but all the rents are directed to be applied for the sole benefit of the children; and in like manner, if any child died in the meantime, no provision is made for such child, although such child might have attained the age of twenty-one years. Under these circumstances, it appears to me, that the money to arise from the sale was intended to be divided amongst such of the wife and children as should be living at the time of the sale, and that in the meantime, the rents were to be applied for the support of such of the wife and children as should be living. For these purposes, the intermediate support of the wife and children, and afterwards the sale of the estate and the application of the purchase-money, the estate was vested in the trustees; but the trust for maintenance and support ceased on the death of the last surviving child under twenty-one.

No doubt, the attainment of twenty-one by the youngest surviving child, was the event upon which the testator contemplated that the trust for maintenance and support would cease; but as he clearly intended a bounty to the wife during the maintenance of any child, and in the event, at least, of her being alive at the time of sale, [300] I cannot so construe the will as to exclude her in the event which happened. It appears to me upon the construction of the will, that the estate was to vest when the trust for maintenance and support ceased; and the wife being the only one of the cestuis que trust who was then living, I am of opinion, that, in the event which have happened, the wife is entitled to the whole estate.

[300] KINSHELA v. LEE. April 26, 1844.

A preliminary inquiry, under the 5th General Order of May 1839, as to who was next of kin, was refused, where the Plaintiff sued in his right of next of kin; but it was denied by the answer that he filled that character.

The Plaintiff by his bill claimed as one of the next of kin of the intestate, through Thomas Lee the son of the intestate's uncle.

The Defendants by their answer denied that the Plaintiff was one of the next of kin, and stated that the intestate's uncle never had any son Thomas.

Mr. E. M. Harrison moved for a preliminary inquiry under the 5th Order of May 1839 (Ord. Can. 136), as to who were the next of kin.

Mr. Toller, contrà. We deny all right of the Plaintiff.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The Plaintiff's title and character being altogether denied, I cannot make this order for a reference.

[301] RICHARDSON, on behalf, &c. v. HASTINGS. Jan. 15, 1844.

[S. C. 13 L. J. Ch. 129; 8 Jur. 72. For other proceedings, see 7 Beav. 323, 354; 11 Beav. 17.]

To a suit seeking to wind up the affairs of a club or partnership, all persons interested must be made parties, though they are numerous; it is not sufficient for one to sue on behalf of the others.

A suit respecting a partnership may be maintained without praying a dissolution. A club was dissolved, and the committee were authorised to realize the assets and wind up the affairs. For that purpose the lease was vested in A. B., and C. A., and B., without the concurrence of the other members of the committee, sold the lease and property, and received the amount. A. B. and D. (another committee-man) signed the receipt, but A. and B. alone received the money. In a bill to make A. and B. account: Held, that C. and D. were not necessary parties.

This case came before the Court on general demurrer to the whole bill, the substance of the allegations of which was as follows:—

In 1836 the Alliance Club, consisting of 100 members, was formed, and for that purpose, a lease of a house in Pall Mall was taken, and a quantity of furniture hired. Rules were, as usual, made for the management of the club, and amongst them, one, by which Messrs. Hopkinson the bankers of the club were alone authorised to receive monies on account of the club. The managing committee were to consist of twenty, and every member was to be bound by the majority at a general meeting.

The pecuniary affairs of the club having become embarrassed, it was agreed, at a special general meeting, that the subscription should be raised, and that the furniture which had been hired should be purchased, with monies to be raised by subscription by way of loan amongst the members, and £400 borrowed of the bankers.

The Plaintiff Richardson, the Defendants Hastings, Emly, and twenty-one other members accordingly subscribed a sum of £805 for the purpose of purchasing the furniture, which was paid into the bankers on account of the club, and by an indenture of the 27th [302] of January 1838, made between Hastings, Emly, and Stewart of the first part, the several subscribing members of the second part, the owner of the furniture of the third part, the bankers of the fourth part, and the Plaintiff of the fifth part, it was agreed that the furniture should be vested in the Plaintiff upon trust (in case the club should pay the bankers the £400 in January 1839) for the club, but charged with the payment of the sums subscribed by the several members, and £1000 to the owner of the furniture; but in case of default in payment of the £400, then in trust to sell and pay the £400 and the other sums due to the owner of the furniture and the subscribing members, and pay the surplus to the committee for the use of the club, and it was also agreed that Hastings, Emly and Stewart should hold the lease in trust to secure the £400 and interest.

The furniture was accordingly purchased, and the lease vested in Hastings, Emly and Stewart.

The embarrassments of the club continuing, it was agreed, at a general meeting held on the 10th of May 1839, that the club should be that day dissolved: that the committee should dispose of the property of the club, and make such arrangement as they, in their discretion, might think fit, for winding up the affairs of the club: that each member should pay into the bankers a sum of £13, to be applied by the committee in payment of the debts of the club; and that the committee should return to each member any balance remaining after winding up the affairs of the club.

The Plaintiff, and sixty-seven other members, accordingly paid £13 each into the bankers, which amounted in the whole to £884.

[303] The bill alleged, that the Defendants Hastings and Emly, who were two of the committee, took upon themselves to act according to their own views, and upon their own individual authority, without consulting the committee in general, or any meeting properly summoned and constituted, or obtaining the sanction or advice of any meeting of the committee; and that they, of their own mere will and without the concurrence or authority of the committee or any duly constituted meeting thereof, sold the lease, furniture, and other property of the club, and received the proceeds thereof, which they retained in their possession. It also alleged, that £1200 had been received by Hastings and Emly for the furniture, but that the receipt for the same had been signed by them and by Dobson, who was auditor of the accounts and one of the members of the committee. That the Defendants Hastings and Emly closed the account with the bankers of the club, and opened one in their own names with another banker, into which bank they placed, to their own account, all the funds which they had received belonging to the club. That besides these sums, Hastings and Emly had induced other members of the club to pay them their contributions.

The bill alleged, that the bankers and the owner of the furniture had been paid, and that the Plaintiff and the other members of the club who subscribed for the purchase of the furniture, and (subject to their claims) all the members of the club, were the only parties interested, as cestuis que trust of the furniture or the produce thereof.

The bill contained charges of misconduct on the part of the Defendants—that they had refused to account—and that the parties interested in the accounts and relief thereby prayed, and on whose behalf the [304] Plaintiff was now suing, were very numerous, and that no suit to which they were all made parties could be effectually prosecuted.

The bill was filed by Richardson, on behalf of himself and all other persons (except the Defendants) who, at the time of the dissolution, were members of the club, against Hastings and Emly, and it prayed an account of the monies produced by the sale of the furniture and received by the Defendants, and that what might be found due thereon might be paid to the Plaintiff, as trustee, and for the purposes mentioned in the indenture of January 1838, or otherwise that the same might be applied upon and for such purposes, under the direction of this Court. It prayed also an account of the other assets of the club received by the Defendants, which, after deducting all sums which had been properly paid or expended by them, on the account or on behalf of the club, might be paid by the Defendants into the bank of Messrs. Hopkinson & Co., to the credit and for the purposes of the club; or if this honourable Court should think meet, into the Bank of England, to the credit of this cause, or otherwise, that the same might be applied, under the direction of this Court, upon and for the purposes to which the same was properly applicable; and that an account might be taken of all such of the assets and effects of the club (if any) which remained unrealised and undisposed of, and also an account of all such debts and liabilities of the club due and remaining unsatisfied at the time of the dissolution thereof, as were unpaid and unsatisfied, and that proper directions might be given for the payment and satisfaction thereof, the Plaintiff and the other members of the club (other than the Defendants) being willing, in case the same should be necessary, to contribute rateably all such sum or sums [305] of money as might be necessary for such purpose; or if the assets of the club should be more than sufficient for the payment and satisfaction of the unpaid and unsatisfied debts and liabilities of the club, then that the residue thereof might be divided between the Plaintiff and the other parties who were members of the club at the dissolution thereof, or their personal representatives.

The Defendants filed a general demurrer for want of equity, and for want of parties, and thereby insisting that the other members of the committee, Stewart, the other members parties to the deed of 1838, the other subscribers to the furniture fund, and Dobson, were necessary parties.

Mr. Purvis and Mr. Hubback, in support of the demurrer, argued that the bill, in effect, sought to have the affairs of the club wound up, which could not be done, except in a suit to which all the members were made parties; Evans v. Stohs (1 Keen, 24. And see Deeks v. Stanhope, V.-C. E. 21st of March and 12th July 1844). That a suit could not be instituted by one of a class on behalf of the others, unless their interests were the same, and the relief sought was in its nature beneficial to all those whom the Plaintiff undertook to represent; Gray v. Chaplin (2 S. & St.

p. 272). That here the subscribers to the furniture fund were entitled to be first paid, and had manifestly an interest quite opposed to the general body of those members who had not subscribed, and which latter body ought in some way or other to be represented in the suit; Richardson v. Larpent (2 Y. & C. (N. C.), 507).

[306] That the parties were not so numerous as to entitle the Plaintiff to sue on their behalf; Bainbridge v. Burton (2 Beav. 539), where thirty-eight persons interested were required to be made parties.

That Stewart was a necessary party, being a trustee of the lease; and that Dobson, who had signed the receipt for the purchase-money for the furniture, and was liable for the amount, was also a necessary party to the suit.

Mr. Kindersley, Mr. Turner, and Mr. Cameron, in support of the bill. The demurrer on record does not insist that all the members of the club are necessary parties, as has been argued at the Bar. They are not, however, necessary parties, for the suit does not seek to have the affairs of the club finally wound up, but merely to compel the two Defendants who have received the assets of the club to account for and render them to the proper custody. If the latter part of the prayer of the bill be considered as asking a settlement of all the affairs of the club, such relief may, according to the recent authority of Walkworth v. Holt (4 Myl. & Cr. 619), be had in a suit constituted like the present, or, at all events, it may be waived at the hearing, and the relief asked confined to the first part of the prayer, namely, the account of the monies received by the Defendants. It is to the common interest of all the members that this common fund should be recovered.

The interest of the subscribers and non-subscribers to the furniture fund are no more conflicting than those of a mortgagee and the general creditors of a deceased party, in which case the mortgagee may sue on behalf [307] of himself and all other the creditors. Greenwood v. Firth (2 Hare, 241, note), Skey v. Bennett (2 Y. & C. (N. C.), 405. And see Aldridge v. Westbrook, 5 Beav. p. 193).

Neither Stewart nor Dobson are necessary parties; they have received no part of the assets, and are in no way accountable.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. There is no doubt of the Plaintiff's equity, but I am of opinion that this bill is so framed as by its nature to be defective for want of parties; it is in vain for the Plaintiff to say that he will stop and limit the relief to that which is first prayed. The prayer of the bill is, in substance, that the affairs of this concern may be wound up, which cannot be effected unless all the questions between the parties are first settled and decided. It appearing, therefore, upon the bill that questions may probably arise between those persons on whose behalf the bill purports to be filed, they cannot be settled in their absence.

At one time, the Court would not entertain a suit between parties in relation to partnership transactions, except upon a bill to wind up the partnership. That is not now the rule of the Court, for I think, and the cases which have been referred to corroborate that view, that the Court will, as between partners, entertain a bill to settle a question which may arise between them, without proceeding to wind up the concerns and affairs of the partnership.

One argument used in support of the bill is, that if it had stopped, and simply asked for the accounts against [308] these Defendants, and that they should pay the balance found due in such a way as to be under the control contemplated by the agreement between the members, the other persons would not be necessary parties. That may be so; but so long as there can be any question between the Plaintiff and those whom he proposes to represent, and which must be decided before the funds can be disposed of, so long I think the bill will be defective for want of parties. I think the case is so stated by the bill as not to preclude questions with respect to the several contributions.

I do not see why either Mr. Stewart or Mr. Dobson should be made a party to this suit, nor do I think that the Plaintiff would be prevented from calling these particular Defendants to account for their receipts in the absence of the other members, provided the bill stopped there, and did not go on to seek a final distribution of the funds and the winding up of the partnership. I shall disallow the demurrer for want of equity, and allow it for want of parties without costs, and I shall give the Plaintiff leave to amend the bill, either by adding parties, if he should be so advised, or by altering the frame of the bill so as to make it appear that it is not necessary to add parties.

[309] THE GUARDIANS OF WIMBORNE UNION v. MASSON. April 23, 24, 1844.

Under the 13th Amended Order of 1828, the six weeks after the answer is to be deemed sufficient, within which a Plaintiff can obtain an order to amend, has reference to the answer to the original and not to an amended bill.

After a full answer the Plaintiff amended. The Defendant answered the amended bill. Six weeks had expired from the time when the first, but not from the time when the second answer was to be deemed sufficient. Held, that any further application for leave to amend must be made to the Court, and not to the Master.

This was a motion for liberty to amend the bill, and the question was, whether the application ought to be made to the Master, or to the Court in the first instance.

The bill was filed against Masson, and against another Defendant, who disclaimed, and was dismissed. After several ineffectual attempts, Masson, on the 27th of July 1843, put in a sufficient answer to the original bill. On the 7th of December 1843 the Plaintiffs obtained an order to amend, which they did accordingly.

On the 29th of January 1844 Masson, who was then the sole Defendant, put in his answer to the amended bill, which became sufficient on the 25th of March following. This answer having disclosed circumstances which rendered it necessary for the Plaintiffs to make E. C. a party to the suit, the Plaintiffs applied to the Court, in the first instance, for liberty to amend. The application was supported by the proper affidavit.

By the 13th Amended Order of April 1828 (Ord. Can. 8) it is provided, "That after an answer has been filed, the Plaintiff shall be at liberty before filing a replication to obtain, upon motion or petition without notice, one order for leave to amend the bill; but no further leave to amend shall be granted after an answer and before replication, unless the Court shall be satisfied," &c., and [310] it afterwards proceeds, "but no order to amend shall be made after answer and before replication, either without notice or upon affidavit, in manner hereinbefore mentioned, unless such order be obtained within six weeks after the answer, if there be only one Defendant, or after the last of the answers, if there be two or more Defendants, is to be deemed sufficient."

The 3 & 4 W. 4, c. 94, s. 13, enacts that the Masters in Ordinary shall hear and determine all applications for leave to amend bills, &c.; and the 20th Order of December 1833 (Ord. Can. 50) directs "that all special applications for leave to withdraw replication, as well as to amend bill, shall be heard and determined by such Master in rotation."

Under these circumstances the question was, whether the application ought to have been made to the Master in the first instance, and to the Court by way of appeal.

Mr. Turner and Mr. Lewin, in support of the application. The question is, whether, under the 13th Amended Order, the six weeks are to be reckoned from the time when the answer to the original or to the amended bill was to be deemed sufficient. If from the former, then the 13th Order is imperative, that no order to amend shall afterwards be made; and the Master having no authority to relax this rule (Lloyd v. Wait, 4 Myl. & Cr. 257; Smith v. Webster, 3 Myl. & Cr. 244), the application is properly made to the Court.

It has been expressly decided that the six weeks has reference to the answer to the original bill: Haddelsea [311] v. Neville (4 Beav. 28), and Bertolacci v. Johnston (2 Hare, 632); and although Lord Lyndhurst in Wharton v. Swann (2 Myl. & K. 362) said that the impression upon his mind was, that the term "answer," used in the 13th of the New Orders, referred to the answer to the amended bill, still, that is quite inconsistent with the decision of Lord Cottenham in The Attorney-General v. Netherland (2 Myl. & Cr. 604), and with Davis v. Prout (5 Beav. 375). If such were not the true construction of the order, a Plaintiff might amend indefinitely, as every fresh amendment would extend the time for making another.

Matchitt v. Palmer (10 Sim. 241) was also cited.

Mr. Willecock, contra. This application ought to have been made to the Master, for the six weeks must be counted from the period when the answer to the existing record, namely to the amended bill, is to be deemed sufficient; from that answer alone the necessity for a further amendment became disclosed. It has been so decided by Lord Lyndhurst in Wharton v. Swann, and recently by Sir L. Shadwell in Wilson v. Wilson (V.-C. E., March 12th, 1844). In Haddeslea v. Nevile, and Attorney-General v. Nethercoat, the decision of Lord Lyndhurst in Wharton v. Swann was not referred to.

Mr. Turner, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. In a former case I had occasion to observe, that by the 13th Order, the Court intended a protection for [312] each and every of the Defendants who had answered, and I retain that opinion.

As it is represented that there is unfortunately a conflict of authorities on the point, I will look at all the cases; but I do not see how it is possible to construe the word "answer" differently in the two parts of this General Order.

April 24. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS said, he had examined the authorities, and that he was of opinion that the answer referred to in the 13th Order was the answer to the original, and not to the amended bill.

NOTE.—This decision has been since followed by Sir J. Wigram in Dean v. Hickinbotham, 24th July 1845.

[313] DALTON v. HAYTER. April 17, 1844.

[See In re Nobbs [1896], 2 Ch. 833.]

A person entitled to an equity of redemption cannot make the mortgagee a party to a suit respecting the mortgaged estate without offering to redeem; but where a mortgagor, by deed to which the mortgagee was not a party, had conveyed another estate to trustees to sell and pay off the mortgage, so as to exonerate the mortgage estate, it was held that a person interested in the equity of redemption might file a bill, not offering to redeem, against the mortgagee and trustees, to have an execution of the trust.

An estate was mortgaged, and by a deed to which the mortgagee was not a party, the mortgagor conveyed another estate to trustees to sell and pay off the mortgage, &c. A party interested in the equity of redemption filed a bill against the trustees and mortgagee to have an execution of the trusts of the deed; and it charged, that the parties to the trust deed did not intend to create any trust for the mortgagee, and that the trustees alleged that the mortgagee was interested in the matters in question, but the Plaintiff charged the contrary, and that he had no legal or equitable interest in the estate, not being entitled to any interest under the deed of trust, "but nevertheless he made some claim to be interested therein, the nature of which he ought to set forth." Held, that this statement of claim prevented a general demurrer by the mortgagee.

To sustain a demurrer for want of parties, the Defendant must shew that the absent person is a necessary party according to the case of such Defendant.

An estate was charged with a mortgage and with portions, and a term was vested in trustees for securing the portions. A second estate was conveyed on trust to sell and pay the mortgage and portions. In a suit for the execution of the trusts, the mortgagee objected that the trustees of the term were not parties; but the objection was overruled.

This case came on upon a general demurrer for want of equity and want of parties. The material statements of the bill were as follow:—

By a settlement executed in 1812 the Shanks estate was settled on Nathaniel Dalton for life, with remainder to Robert F. G. Dalton for life, with remainder to his first son in tail (the Plaintiff), with power to Robert F. G. Dalton to charge the estate with £20,000 for his own use, and a term was limited to Lethbridge and Grant, in trust to raise £20,000 for the younger children of Robert F. G. Dalton.

Previous to 1824 the Shanks estate had been charged, under the power, to Ingram with £10,000 out of the [314] £20,000, and Robert F. G. Dalton being about to charge it with the remaining £10,000, an agreement was come to between Nathaniel Dalton and Robert F. G. Dalton, by which Robert F. G. Dalton, for valuable consideration, agreed to throw the two charges of £20,000 primarily upon the Bagber and Semley estates, to which he was entitled in reversion in fee expectant on the decease of Nathaniel Dalton.

Accordingly by indenture dated the 6th of April 1824, made between Robert F. G. Dalton, Nathaniel Dalton, and the Defendant Hayter, a trustee, the Bagber and Semley estates were conveyed to Hayter, subject to the life interest of Nathaniel Dalton therein, upon trust, on the death of Nathaniel Dalton, to sell, and apply the produce in payment of another mortgage of £10,000, charged exclusively on the Bagber and Semley estate, and vested in A'Court, and afterwards to pay Ingram the mortgage for £20,000, and then to pay the £20,000 for younger children's portions. The mortgagees were not parties to this deed. At the same time the Shanks estate was charged to Ingram with the remaining £10,000.

Ingram's mortgage for £20,000 became vested in the Defendant Beavan, and A'Court's mortgage on the Bagber and Semley estate became vested in Moody. Nathaniel Dalton having died in 1825, this bill was filed against Hayter the trustee, Moody the mortgagee on the Bagber and Semley estates, Beavan the mortgagee for £20,000 on the Shanks estate, and against the younger children. The trustees of the term of 1000 years for securing the younger children's portions were not made parties to the suit. The bill sought to charge the trustee for breach of duty in not having sooner sold the estate, and it prayed for a sale of the Bagber and Semley estates, and for the application of the produce according [315] to the trusts of the deed of 1824, but it sought no specific relief against the mortgagees, nor did it offer to redeem them.

The bill contained the following charges:—"That it was not, in any manner, the intention of the parties to the said indenture of the 6th of April 1824, to create any trust for the said Charles Ashe A'Court, or the said Christopher Ingram, or the younger children entitled to such portions as aforesaid, and charged on the said Shanks estate, but solely to exonerate the said Shanks estate from the aforesaid charges thereon."

"And the Defendant Hayter alleges, that the Defendants Moody and Beavan, and the brothers and sister of the Plaintiff are interested in the matters in question in this suit; but the Plaintiff charges the contrary to be true, and that the said last-mentioned parties have not any legal or equitable interest in the said Bagber and Semley estates, or the rents and profits thereof, not being entitled, in any way, to any estate or interest therein, or charge thereon, under the said indenture secondly hereinbefore stated, and dated the 6th of April 1824, but nevertheless they make some claim to be interested therein, the nature whereof they ought respectively to set forth."

To this bill the Defendant Beavan filed a demurrer for want of equity and want of parties.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Beavan, in support of the demurrer. Admitting, for the purpose of this demurrer, every allegation in this bill to be true, then it appears that the Defendant Beavan has no interest in the matters in question, or in the Bagber and Semley estates, but he merely "makes some claim to be interested therein." It is quite immaterial what claim he may make, if, for the [316] purposes of the Plaintiff's argument, he must be assumed to have no interest; "a general vague charge that a Defendant claims an interest in the matters in question in the suit, is insufficient to avoid a demurrer." Plumbe v. Plumbe (4 Y. & Col. 345). If it were otherwise the most perfect stranger might, by means of such a charge, be made a Defendant to any suit in equity. The Plaintiff seeks no relief against the Defendant; if he wishes to know his claims on the estate it is matter of discovery merely.

Secondly, no bill can properly be filed against a mortgagee by a party entitled to the equity of redemption, except for the purpose of redeeming him; Tasker v. Small (3 Myl. & Cr. p. 69); Pearse v. Hewitt (7 Simons, p. 479). It is the offer which the party entitled to the equity of redemption makes to redeem, and which subjects him to be foreclosed, that raises his equity; without that, this Court will consider the mortgagee as absolute owner of the estate. Suppose this suit to go on, all the accounts will be taken, and then it will be found that the produce of the second estate is insufficient to pay off the first mortgage to A'Court; but even if there remained a surplus, a mortgagee is not bound to receive a payment in part. It will be said that the Defendant may be interested in the produce of the estate, but that will not make him a proper party. None can be properly parties to a suit for specific performance except the parties to the contract; the cestuis que trust, though interested in the produce, cannot be made parties; Tasker v. Small (3 Myl. & Cr. p. 68. And see Wood v. White, 4 Myl. & Cr. 460). It may then be said that he is interested in the account; but "a party is not to be brought before the Court to stand by that he may be bound by the account to be taken between two other persons;" Ramsbottom v. Wallis (Coots on Mortgage, p. 710, and Jacob, p. 352).

[317] Thirdly, the trustees of the term are necessary parties. If the younger children are necessary parties their trustees, who have the legal term, are also necessary parties to this suit.

Mr. Wood, contra, in support of the bill. The Defendant should have disclaimed, otherwise the Court must make a declaration of his right before it can administer the trusts. The Plaintiff, who is interested in the Shanks estate, and also in the Bagber estate, desires to have the trusts affecting the latter estate carried into effect, so as to exonerate the Shanks estate. He considered that the Defendant Beavan had no interest in the Bagber estates; but the trustee insisted he had and that he was a necessary party. It is said that a general charge in the bill that a party claims an interest is not sufficient to entitle the Plaintiff to an answer, but though a witness cannot be made a Defendant, yet, "if the bill charges he is interested, the Defendant must plead and support it by an answer denying that allegation, and cannot demur;" Plummer v. May (1 Ves. sen. 426), Fenton v. Hughes (7 Ves. 287). The present bill expressly states that the Defendant claims an interest, and at the same time denies the claim; the Defendant ought, therefore, either to disclaim or to set out his claim, if any exist.

He admitted that the general rule was that, ordinarily, a mortgagee could only be brought before the Court for the purpose of redemption, but distinguished this case, which was for carrying the trusts of a deed into execution, and which could not be done in the absence of the parties interested or claiming an interest.

He contended that the trustees of the term were not necessary parties.

[318] Mr. Kindersley, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. It seems by a deed executed in 1812 power was given to Mr. Dalton to raise a sum of £20,000 for his own use, and besides that, a term was created for the purpose of providing portions to the amount of £20,000 for his younger children. It is unnecessary to say anything respecting the limitations of the estate. In the year 1824, and by the execution of the power to raise £20,000, Mr. Ingram became the owner of the charge of £20,000 on the Shanks estate. Contemporaneously with this, other estates, called the Bagber and Semley estates, were conveyed to trustees, on trust to raise money to be applied, in the first place, in exoneration of the charges on the Shanks estate. It does not appear by these deeds, that the incumbrancer on the Shanks estate had any right to interfere, in any way, with the execution of the trusts relating to the Bagber and Semley estates, although, in one view of the subject, it might be said that the mortgage, though secured on the Shanks estate, was to be provided for by means of the trusts affecting the Bagber and Semley estates. After all, the legal right of the mortgagee rested solely on the Shanks estate as far as now appears.

This bill is filed for the purpose of carrying into execution the trusts relating to the Bagber and Semley estates, calling on the trustee to account for the receipts and proceeds in respect of a portion of the estate that had been sold, and praying a sale of that part of the estate which remains unsold, and that the money may be applied, according to the trusts, in exoneration of the Shanks estate.

[319] The trustee, being called upon to render his accounts and carry the trusts into execution, alleges, that the Defendant Beavan, who now represents Ingram, has an interest in the execution of the trusts. The words as alleged in the bill are not so, but "that he has an interest in the matters in question in this suit." The matters in question in the suit are the matters relating to the execution of the trusts of the Bagber and Semley estates. Now this is quite contrary to the view which is taken of the matter by the Plaintiff; and accordingly the Plaintiff, after stating that this is alleged by the trustee, charges the contrary of these pretences to be true, and charges that Mr. Beavan has not "any legal or equitable interest in the Bagber and Semley estates, or the rents and profits thereof, not being entitled, in any way, to any estate or interest therein," that is, in the Bagber and Semley estates, "or charge thereon, under the indentures dated on the 5th and 6th of April 1824;" therefore distinctly charging he has no interest, "but nevertheless he makes some claim to be interested therein," that is to be interested in the Bagber and Semley estates, under these deeds, I cannot construe it in any other way "the nature whereof he ought to set forth."

Now to this bill there is a demurrer for want of equity, and the first ground of demurrer is, "I am a mortgagee on the Shanks estate, and you do not offer to redeem me." If the question in this cause related to the Shanks estate, I should say that this was a decisive answer to this bill, for I take it to be settled, that the owner of the equity of redemption cannot make a mortgagee a party to any suit in this Court, without offering to redeem him; but there is no part of this suit which has any regard to the Shanks estate, except only in this way, that the persons interested in the Shanks [320] estate desire to have an execution of the trusts relating to the Bagber and Semley estates, in order that the money to arise therefrom may be applied in exoneration of the Shanks estate.

But it is not attempted to support the bill on that alone. Mr. Wood has very properly admitted that a mortgagor cannot make a mortgagee a party in respect of his mortgage estate, without offering to redeem him. But he says this: you claim to be entitled; you have filed a demurrer to this bill, by which you admit everything which is distinctly charged: it is distinctly charged that you claim to be interested in this property, the Bagber and Semley estates under those deeds. You admit that for the purpose of the demurrer, and thereby at the same time admit, that the Plaintiff cannot have a sale of this estate and the execution of these trusts, otherwise than in your presence.

The answer given to that is, that this allegation is much too vague, and that the Plaintiff ought to have alleged the interest in some more distinct manner.

I am certainly very desirous not to introduce a rule by which persons can be brought into Court on mere vague charges of having an interest in the matter; but I think the most useful operation of Courts of Equity would be very much diminished, if persons were not under the necessity of disclosing the nature of their claims, which, on some occasions, they are unwilling and the Plaintiff is unable to state. The substance of the bill is this: the Plaintiff desires to have the execution of the trusts affecting the Bagber and Semley estates. He says, you, the Defendant, claim to be interested in them: I deny your claim altogether; but in order that I may be able to meet and rebut your claim and answer it, let me know the whole particulars of it.

[321] I must repeat the observation made in one of the cases cited, that I think the Defendant has a little "mistaken his way" in admitting his claim by the demurrer. It is not like the case of Plumbe v. Plumbe (4 You. & Coll. 345), a mere general allegation that he has some interest; but an allegation of an interest following in the same sentence the denial of being interested under those deeds. It is stated in this way. I charge you have no interest under these deeds, nevertheless you claim an interest; let me know what it is you claim. Under these circumstances, I do not think the demurrer can be allowed.

With regard to the other question as to parties: when a Defendant demurs for want of parties, he ought to shew, that, according to his own case, another party is wanted. The Defendant says, if I am made a party, there is another person, who, in relation to another part of the case, ought to be brought before the Court, in order that his interest may be administered. That, however, has nothing to do with this Defendant; he files this demurrer for his own benefit, and has nothing to do with the following charge of £20,000 to be raised under the term created for that purpose. The demurring Defendant has nothing to do with this claim; he claims paramount to the term; but whether paramount or subsequent does not signify: he claims not at all under the term. I think the Defendant has nothing at all to do with it. It is argued that there will be a defect as to the parties at the hearing, and that the Defendant desires not to be delayed; but I think this demurrer cannot be allowed upon that ground.

It has been said that the Defendant may have other interests than those suggested by the bill; but I am of [322] opinion that the bill relates only to the interest he may have in these estates under the deeds; and if the Defendant answers that he has no interest whatever under these deeds, it seems to me, that in the present state of this record he will have answered the bill. If, on the other hand, he has other claims than those in respect of those deeds, it concerns himself to say, that this property is not to be disposed of in his absence; and when he sets forth that claim, he will, for his own security, have his interest stated in such a manner that he shall be protected.

The demurrer must be overruled; but I shall give no costs on either side.

NOTE.—An appeal to the Lord Chancellor is pending. [A note in the Addenda states that the parties entered into a compromise, and that the appeal was abandoned.]

[323] RICHARDSON v. HASTINGS. Feb. 22, 1844.

[S. C. 13 L. J. Ch. 142. For other proceedings, see 7 Beav. 301, 354; 11 Beav. 17.]

There are two general rules of the Court; first, that all persons interested in the subject-matter of the litigation ought to be parties; the second, that the Court always endeavours to do complete justice, so that the matters involved in the suit may not be left open to future litigation; but these rules are both occasionally departed from.

As to the necessity of the Court's modifying its rules and adapting its forms of proceedings to the altered circumstances of society existing at the present day.

A bill may be filed respecting a partnership without praying a dissolution.

In a continuing partnership, if a few have an interest in a particular subject adverse to all the rest, a bill may be filed against the few, by one on behalf, &c.

In the case of an insolvent partnership not formally dissolved, a bill may be filed by one or more on behalf of the rest against the governing body, to have the assets collected and applied towards the payment of the debts, without seeking to ascertain the rights and liabilities of the parties as between themselves, but leaving them open to future litigation.

By the rules of a club, the bankers were alone authorised to receive money on account of the club. Some of the members subscribed and purchased the furniture, which, by deed executed by the subscribers, was vested in the Plaintiff A. B., in trust to repay the amounts subscribed, and to pay the surplus to the committee for the benefit of the club. The club becoming embarrassed, was afterwards dissolved, and the committee were authorised to wind up the affairs. Two of the committee, C. and D., sold the furniture, and alone received the produce, together with other general assets of the club. A bill was filed by A. B. on behalf, &c., against C. and D., and E., a non-subscribing member, to recover the monies in the hands of C. and D., and praying that the furniture money might be paid to the Plaintiff, on the trusts of the deed, "or otherwise as the Court might direct," and that the general assets recovered might be paid to the bankers or otherwise, &c. Held, that the bill was not defective for want of parties, and that neither the other parties to the deed, nor the other members of the club, were necessary parties.

The demurrer in this case having been allowed (ante, p. 301), the Plaintiff amended his bill, and made a Mr. Welch, one of the members of the club who had neither subscribed to the furniture fund, nor executed the deed of 1838, a Defendant thereto. By the amendment, he struck out that part of the prayer which implied a winding up of the affairs of the club; and limited the prayer to an account of the monies received by the Defendants Hastings and Emly from the sale of the furniture, and that the amount due thereon might be paid to the Plaintiff as trustee of the indenture of the 27th of January 1838, "or otherwise paid as the Court might [324] direct;" and for an account of the other club monies received by Hastings and Emly, and "that what should be found due from them on taking the said account, after allowing or deducting all sums which had been properly paid or expended by them on the account, or on behalf of the said late club, might be paid by the said Defendants into the bank of Messrs. Hopkinson & Co., to the credit and for the purposes of the said club, or otherwise as the Court should direct."

The Defendants Hastings and Emly again filed a demurrer to the amended bill similar to the former demurrer.

Mr. Purvis and Mr. Hubback, in support of the demurrer, argued, that the record remained, substantially, the same as on the occasion of the former demurrer; for the Court could not limit its interference to the recovery of the money, without proceeding to distribute it, and that for this purpose it was absolutely necessary that the conflicting rights of the different parties should be ascertained and declared. That consequently all the persons whose absence had been objected to on the former occasion were now, for the reasons formerly urged, necessary parties to the present record.

That all the persons who executed the deed of 1838 were necessary parties, and that the Plaintiff could not sue on their behalf; Newton v. Lord Egmont (4 Sim. 574); where it was held that all the persons who had executed a creditor's deed were necessary parties to a suit affecting their interests.

[325] That the parties were not so numerous that their presence could be dispensed with; Harrison v. Stewardson (2 Hare, 530); where the number was twenty.

Mr. Kindersley, Mr. Turner, and Mr. Cameron, contra, insisted, that the form of the record had been so altered, that the objection raised on the former occasion had been successfully removed; that the bill limited the relief sought, to a simple restitution of certain funds of the club, improperly retained by two of its members, and sought no administration, or distribution of the funds, nor any winding up of the concern; that it was for the general benefit of all parties that the fund should be recovered and placed in the proper custody, or as the Court might direct, and therefore, that the case was in its nature and prayer similar to Hichens v. Congreve (4 Russell, 562), where it was held, that some shareholders might file a bill on behalf, &c., to obtain a restitution of funds improperly applied by directors to their own use. So in Holmes v. Henty (4 Cl. & Fin. 99) on a bill filed by two trustees on behalf, &c., against some trustees of a savings bank, to make them responsible for a misapplication of the trust monies, it was even held (page 142), that it was unnecessary to make all the persons who concurred in the resolution for the misapplication of the trust monies parties to a suit for replacing it; but only those who actually took and misapplied the money. And that this case was governed by the decision of Lord Cottenham in Wallworth v. Holt (4 Myl. & Cr. 619).

That a bill to carry the trusts of a creditor's deed into execution might be filed on behalf of all the creditors [326] by one of them only where they have all executed the deed, but are very numerous; Weld v. Bonham (2 S. & St. 91). In Newton v. Lord Egmont the bill sought to have the priorities declared.

That the Plaintiff was trustee of the produce of the furniture, and that it was unnecessary to make his cestui que trust a party to a suit for recovering it; Franco v. Franco (3 Ves. 75), Angier v. Stannard (3 Myl. & K. 566).

Saville v. Tankred (1 Ves. sen. 101), — v. Walford (4 Russ. 372), Richardson v. Larpent (2 Y. & C. (N. C.), 507), Calverley v. Phelps (6 Mad. 229), and Mitford (p. 164) were also cited.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. All cases of this kind are attended with some degree of difficulty, and the conclusion to be arrived at depends on rather nice circumstances. The arguments in support of a demurrer of this kind have generally a very strong foundation, because cases of this kind always deviate from two old and general rules of the Court; one is, that all persons interested in the subject-matter of the litigation ought to be parties; the other is, that the Court endeavours to do complete justice in every case, so that the matters involved in the suit may not be left open to future litigation.

Now the present bill is, to a certain extent, a departure from both these rules, because it is proposed to be prosecuted in the absence of parties interested in the suit; and it also proposes that the sums to be recovered [327] should be left at their disposal if they can agree, and if not, then that they may be left for future litigation. However, exceptions to the two rules which I have stated, have at all times been sanctioned. I recollect a treatise, in which one of the chapters was headed, "In what cases necessary parties may be dispensed with." The assumption that necessity could admit of any qualification may seem to imply that exceptions to the ordinary rule were admitted with difficulty.

It has however become necessary to extend the cases of exception, so as to keep pace with the progress and complications of the transactions of mankind; and everybody who reads what Lord Cottenham has said on more than one occasion, must be perfectly satisfied with the justice of his observation, and see how necessary it is for this Court, acting always within the limits of its jurisdiction, by an application of its powers, so necessary for the administration of justice, to adapt its forms of proceeding to the altered circumstances of society in our own times, and modify its rules so as to meet the changes of circumstances under which it is, at the present day, called on to administer justice. (See Mare v. Malachy, 1 Myl. & Cr. p. 579; Taylor v. Salmon, 4 Myl. & Cr. p. 141; Walkworth v. Holl, 4 Myl. & Cr. p. 635.) In no class of cases has the extension of the exception been more frequent than in cases like the present.

I cannot say that I entertain any doubt of the propriety of the decision which I made in Evans v. Stokes (1 Keen, 24). I still think that the winding up of a partnership implies a complete settlement of all the rights and liabilities as between the parties themselves; and as they may be in conflict with regard to these rights and liabilities, the [328] partnership cannot be finally wound up in the absence of all the partners. This may be attended with very great inconvenience, even to the extent of preventing the due administration of justice between the parties; but this appears to me necessarily to follow from the established rule of this Court, which I have stated, and which cannot be corrected without a general authority. It was at one time supposed, that in consequence of the second general rule, that complete justice must be done with respect to the subject-matter, the Court could not, and would not, interfere at all as between partners, unless the partnership was to be dissolved and finally wound up and settled; and there are several conflicting cases in the books on that subject, different Judges having entertained very strong opinions and very different views on that question. (1) I noticed, on the former occasion, that it now appears very clear that there is no such rule. It has been decided, that in a continuing partnership, if a few have an interest in a particular subject adverse to all the rest, and claim for themselves the benefit of that interest, a bill may be filed against those few, by one or more partners on behalf of themselves and all the rest. That is a remarkable instance of a case where all persons interested are not brought before the Court: however, it is not much more remarkable than the cases where one creditor or one legatee is permitted to sue on behalf of himself and many other persons and some other similar cases. The Court has even gone to this extent; in the case of an insolvent partnership not formally dissolved, it has permitted [329] a bill to be filed by one or more on behalf of the rest, against the governing body, to have the assets collected, and applied, as far as they would go, towards the discharge of the debts; and that without seeking to ascertain the rights and liabilities of the parties as between themselves, and consequently, leaving litigation as between those parties entirely open, after the debts have been paid : that is, it has sanctioned a suit which sought nothing but to compel a satisfaction pro tanto of the partnership debts, as far as the deficient assets would extend, and then leave all the members of the partnership exposed to such litigation as the unsatisfied creditors might choose to adopt for the recovery of the remainder of their debts ; and also leave the partners liable, as amongst themselves, to such suits for contribution as the particular circumstances of the case might render necessary.

(1) See Forman v. Homfray, 2 Ves. & B. 329; Harrison v. Armitage, 4 Mad. 143; Marshall v. Colman, 2 Jac. & W. 266; Richards v. Davies, 2 Russ. & Myl. 347; Loscombe v. Russell, 4 Sim. 8; Knebell v. White, 2 Y. & Col. (Exch.), 15; Bentley v. Bates, 4 Y. & Col. (Exch.), 182; Miles v. Thomas, 9 Sim. p. 609; Fairthorne v. Weston, 3 Hare, 387.

In this case, it is alleged that the two Defendants, Hastings and Emly, have possessed themselves of property belonging to this club, which I must consider as a partnership : that one of the sums, namely, the furniture money, is subject to a peculiar trust, and the other monies are general assets of the partnership. They have possessed themselves of these sums of money, and refuse to account for them. This bill desires to recover them, not for the purpose of distribution by the Court through the means of this suit, but for the purpose of bringing them within the control of the governing body of the partnership, in order that they may be applied, under their control, according to the rights of the parties. That seems to me to be the nature of the bill. Can that be done? The Plaintiff and all the other members, except these two Defendants, must have an interest in having the money, which the demurrer admits to be in the Defendants' possession, brought [330] within the control of the club ; that is the common interest of all. How this money, when it is brought within the control of the club, ought to be applied is another matter. To ask to recover it and place it within the control of the club, and leave it there subject to litigation, is asking no more than was done in the case of Wallworth v. Holt (4 Myl. & Cr. 619), where matters were thus left. If, then, it is for the common benefit of all, except the two Defendants, that these funds should be recovered, why should it not be done? It is said that this is a case of dissolution. Very true ; and this shews that there ought to be a winding up and a final settlement. But how is it with a partnership after a dissolution and before the affairs of the partnership are wound up? The mutual connection between the partners is not dissolved with the dissolution of the partnership, because it must continue for the purpose of collecting the assets and winding up the partnership, and, until these matters are all closed, there is a quasi partnership, a mutual interest between the parties. (Crawshaw v. Collins, 15 Ves. 226.) One of the things required for the winding up of the partnership is, that the assets should be collected ; and it appears that two individuals have got into their possession assets which they retain adversely to all the rest, while it is the common interest that they should be collected and regularly applied towards the winding up of the partnership.

In the present state of the record the question is, whether the Defendants are to answer. I cannot determine, at this time, whether, in consequence of what may appear in the answer, it may not hereafter be absolutely necessary to make the parties referred to and other persons parties. Taking the statements of the bill as they now stand admitted by the demurrer, it does [331] not appear to me that I ought to allow the present demurrer ; but, overruling it, I beg to have it clearly understood, that it may appear hereafter that it is quite necessary not only to make the persons now pointed out, but other persons, parties ; for after this demurrer is overruled, the Defendants may still raise the same objection by their answer. I do not therefore mean to determine anything with respect to the necessity of making these persons parties hereafter.

Next, with respect to the objection to the form in which payment of these sums is prayed, I cannot construe it in the way in which it has been contended for. It is asked that the amount shall be paid "to the Plaintiff, or in such manner as the Court may direct." It is not clear that it ought to be paid to the Plaintiff, but that will be a question for discussion hereafter, and as the case now stands on the bill, admitted, as it is, by the demurrer, it seems indeed that it ought not to be paid to the Plaintiff. Then, in what way is it to be paid? "Otherwise as the Court may direct." It has been argued very ably, that the Court can direct nothing but the payment to the proper hands, that is, either to the creditors of this club, or to some person or other who may ultimately, on the winding up of the affairs of the club, be found to be the proper person to receive it. I cannot say that I think so. This bill not desiring to have the partnership wound up, what I shall have to do at the hearing, will be to take care that it is paid to the persons who ought to have the management of it; and I shall ascertain that, when I see the answer of the Defendants, who no doubt will tell me to whom it ought to be paid, and when I know that, I can direct the payment.

It is very possible that these gentlemen may hereafter [332] shew, that they have nothing at all to pay, or they may admit that they have sums to pay, but allege difficulties with respect to the distribution of them after that payment shall have been made. I can conceive myself no difficulty in ordering these monies to be paid to the persons who, under the direction and control of the club or the governing body of the club, have a right to distribute them. If there should be occasion, an inquiry may be had on that subject, and the Defendants, desiring that it should not be paid to the Plaintiff, will afford me every assistance in determining to whom it ought to be paid, for the purpose of placing it under the control of the governing body of the club for distribution. The same observation applies to both sums of money: one will go to the furniture account, the other will go to the general account of the club.

I think I ought to overrule this demurrer; and I do so entirely without prejudice to the Defendants taking any objection for want of parties by their answer. If they put in an answer stating the objections and the grounds for supporting them, the cause may be set down to be heard, under the recent General Orders (Ordines Can. 175), on the objection for want of parties; and if not so set down, it may still appear at the hearing that the suit is defective for want of parties.

The demurrer must be overruled, but without costs.

[333] SCORE v. FORD. April 26, 1844.

Where trust money appears to have been invested on an improper security, it will, on motion, be ordered to be brought into Court within a given time; but if the case be proper, the period will be extended from time to time, to enable the Defendant to realize the security.

Where part of a residuary estate has been invested on an improper security, and the Defendant has an interest therein, the Court, on being satisfied that there is no existing claim on the estate, sometimes confines the amount to be paid into Court to the share of the Plaintiff.

An intestate died in 1826, leaving a widow and two infant children. The widow administered, and in 1840 executed a deed which stated that the assets actually realised amounted to £4000, of which she had appropriated to herself £700, and that the remainder had been invested on mortgages, which were specified. In her answer to a bill filed by one of the children in 1843, she stated that this was wholly erroneous, that the residue amounted to £1600 only, and that the Plaintiff had received £390 on account of her one-third. The answer stated that the debts had been paid, but the statements were most unsatisfactory. A sum of £700 appeared to have been lent on an improper security. The Court, on motion, ordered the whole £700 to be brought into Court.

In 1826 E. H. died intestate, leaving his widow and two infant children. The widow took out administration and possessed herself of the assets. The Plaintiff, as one of the children, was entitled to one-third of the residue. She attained twenty-one in 1838.

In March 1840 the widow married the Defendant Ford, and in May following a settlement was made, whereby, after reciting the death, &c., of the intestate, and "that the proceeds of the intestate's personal estate actually realized amounted to £4000," out of which the widow had appropriated to herself £700, and had purchased a house therewith, and had invested the residue upon three several mortgage securities, one of £1700 from Veevers, and two others which were specified, the share of the widow was thereby settled upon certain trusts for herself for life for her separate use, &c.

In 1843 one of the children and her husband filed this bill against the widow, her second husband and the other child, praying the usual accounts, the ascertainment of the residue, and payment of one-third to the Plaintiff.

[334] The principal Defendants, by their answer, represented that the statements in the settlement were wholly inaccurate; that the amount of the intestate's estate was, "through inadvertence and mistake," considerably overrated; and that the actual amount thereof which could be realised, after payment of the debts, &c., did not, "at the time the settlement was made, amount to the sum of £1200 or thereabouts." It stated that the debts had been paid, and that there remained a surplus of personal estate, amounting to £1600 nearly, but of which £400 had not been received.

It represented that £390 had been paid to the Plaintiffs, which was £10 less than the amount of the Plaintiffs' share of the assets stated to have been realised.

The explanation of the alleged errors in the settlement was of a most unsatisfactory nature, as were also the accounts of the assets, the statement of the application thereof, and the dealing therewith.

The answer stated, that the Defendant had lent £700 part of the assets on bond, which had afterwards been paid off, and had, by a peculiar mode of dealing, been lent on the security of a contingent reversionary interest in £1250 and a policy.

The answer to the amended bill rendered the matter still more unsatisfactory; and the Defendants stated therein, "that the sum of £1550 or thereabouts, instead of a sum of £1200 only or thereabouts, as in the former answer was erroneously stated, was, in truth and in fact, realized by the Defendant, in respect of the said intestate's personal estate, and not a sum exceeding £4000."

[335] A motion was now made for payment of the £700 into Court.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Wood, in support of the motion, argued, that as £700, part of the assets of the testator, had been lent by the administratrix on an improper security, it ought to be brought into Court, especially as the explanation given by the Defendants, in their two answers, were so unsatisfactory and irreconcilable, and were wholly inconsistent with the statement contained in a solemn instrument executed by them.

Vigars v. Binfield (3 Mad. 62), Collis v. Collis (2 Sim. 365), and see Wyatt v. Sharratt (3 Beavan, 498), Meyer v. Montrou (4 Beavan, 343).

Mr. Tiney, for the Defendants, contra, contended that the Plaintiffs' right, at this stage of the cause, must depend entirely on the admissions in the answer, and that the Plaintiffs were only entitled to have brought into Court such portion of the £700 as, by the admissions in the answer, belonged to them. He stated that the other child would appear and concur in this view of the case.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I must order this sum of money into Court. The husband may find the settlement to which he was a party, a very unfortunate concern for him. In that settlement, this lady has represented the assets to be very large, and to amount to £4000; she has nevertheless put in her answer, saying, that the items specified in the settlement are all erroneous, but has [336] given an unsatisfactory explanation of the matter; I must, therefore, look at the other facts of the case. It is clearly admitted that she possessed £700, part of the assets of the intestate; that she lent that sum on a security, which the Court does not approve of; that she afterwards received it back, and again applied it in a manner which the Court could not sanction; and so far her liability to pay into Court is undoubted.

It is said, that I ought not to order the whole £700 to be paid into Court, because the Plaintiffs are only interested in part of it. There are certainly cases in which the Court, on being satisfied that there is no existing claim on the estate, and that the party against whom the motion is directed has clearly an interest in the fund, confines the amount to be paid into Court to the share of the Plaintiff. (Rogers v. Rogers, 1 Anst. 174.) This however depends on the peculiar circumstances of the case, and on the mode in which the matter is brought forward. Is this a case in which it can be assumed that the assets of the intestate are clear, or that £1600 are the whole of the assets? I cannot assume it.

Taking the whole together, I must order this sum to be paid into Court within a given time, and if the Defendants have the money outstanding on a security which they cannot realize, except by obtaining time, they must apply to the Court to extend

it. That is the common and constant practice of the Court. If trust money is traced into the hands of a party, and it is shewn that it has been improperly applied, it will be ordered to be brought into Court within a stated time; but if the case afterwards appear such, as to render a further indulgence just and prudent, the period is enlarged, from time to time, to enable the party to realize the security.

I must order the money to be brought into Court within six weeks; and, if a further extension of time be required, the proper course will be for the Defendants to apply, and, if the circumstances of the case justify it, the Court will then grant a further time.

[337] INMAN v. WHITLEY. Jan. 29, April 18, 1844.

A feme covert was entitled to a reversionary interest in a sum of money vested in her husband and another as trustees. By deed, expressed to be made between the tenant for life of the one part, and the trustees (including the husband) of the other part, the tenant for life, who alone executed the deed, declared that the trustees should hold the fund on certain modified trusts, whereby the wife's reversionary interest was made subject to her power of appointment by deed or will. The wife died, leaving her husband surviving, having appointed the reversionary interest away from her husband. The husband afterwards died, and the reversionary interest subsequently came into possession. The Court considered, that, under the circumstances, the husband ought to be deemed to have acquiesced in the arrangement, and accepted the trusts for the benefit of the wife's appointees; and Held, that the appointees of the wife were entitled as against the representatives of the husband.

On the 1st of January 1795 George Inman executed an indenture, whereby it was purported, that he appointed an estate at Blagdon to John Whitley and John Inman in fee, upon trust to apply so much of the rents as they should find necessary, for the support of his son George Inman for life, and, after his decease, to convey one moiety of the estate to Henry Inman in fee, and the other moiety to such uses as Sarah, the wife of John Inman (the trustee), should by deed or will appoint, and the surplus rents not required for the maintenance of George were to be equally divided between Henry and Sarah.

After the death of George Inman the father, the parties beneficially interested in the estate agreed amongst [338] themselves, that a recovery should be suffered of the estate, and that the same should be vested in the trustees, John Inman and John Whitley, and be sold. Accordingly, by certain indentures dated the 5th and 6th of November 1795, which were executed by George Inman the son of the first part, Henry Inman and his wife, John Inman and Sarah his wife, and John Whitley of the second part, Robert Blake of the third part, and Peter Cox of the fourth part, and by a common recovery suffered in pursuance of such deed, the estate was vested in John Inman and John Whitley in fee, on trust to sell and invest the purchase-money on Government or real securities, which securities were to be held in trust to apply the interest for the maintenance of George Inman the son for his life, and, after his decease, the trustees were to stand possessed thereof, in trust for Henry Inman and Sarah Inman, in equal parts or shares, or in trust for their respective executors, administrators or assigns, in case they, or either of them, should die in the lifetime of George.

The estate was sold, and the clear purchase-money, amounting to £1050 was paid to John Inman. Some time afterwards, an indenture, dated the 24th day of February 1802, and purporting to be made between George Inman the son of the one part, and John Inman and John Whitley of the other part, was executed by George Inman alone. That indenture, after reciting the deeds of 1st of January and 6th of November 1795, and that George Inman was desirous that the purchase-money should be settled agreeably to the intention of his father, witnessed, that George Inman declared, that the purchase-money of £1050 should be vested in John Inman and John Whitley, on trust, to apply the income, or so much thereof as should be necessary for the support and maintenance of George for his life, and, after [339] his decease, to stand possessed of one moiety thereof for the benefit of Henry Inman, and of the other moiety to the use of such person as Sarah Inman should, by deed or will signed and published in the presence of three or more witnesses (and which will she was to have power to make), limit or appoint; and, in default of such direction, limitation or appointment, to the use of the said George Inman. And if the income arising from the £1050 should be more than sufficient for the maintenance of George, the trustees were empowered to divide the surplus equally between Henry and Sarah.

On the 3d of September 1807 Sarah Inman, by her will of that date, and executed in the presence of three witnesses, and purporting to be made in execution of her power under the deed of the 24th of February 1802, appointed the interest of the principal sum belonging to her under that deed, to her husband John Inman for his life, and, after his death, she gave and appointed the principal sum so belonging to her to John Inman of Minehead, and she appointed her husband John Inman executor of her will.

Sarah Inman, having made this will, died in the year 1812, leaving her husband surviving her. He did not prove her will, but died in the year 1813, having first made his own will, whereby he appointed John Whitley and James Tucker executors, and they, having proved his will, became his legal personal representatives.

In the meantime, viz., in the year 1809, Henry Inman died, and Catherine Inman became his legal personal representative.

George Inman lived till the year 1838, and, supposing the several instruments to have been valid, John Whitley [340] was surviving trustee, on trust to apply so much of the income as was required for the maintenance of George, and to pay any surplus to Catherine Inman as executrix of Henry, and to John Inman of Minehead, as legatees of Sarah, in equal shares, and, on trust, after the death of George, to divide the principal money equally between Catherine and John.

On the 15th April 1819 John Inman of Minehead, by indenture of that date, made between himself of the one part, and the Plaintiffs William Southcote Inman and Anna Victoria Little (then Anna Victoria Inman) of the other part, assigned to them as tenants in common, the moiety of the principal sum of £1050 to which he was entitled under the will of Sarah Inman, and all surplus monies payable in respect of such moiety.

Mr. Whitley, the surviving trustee of the deed of 1802, died in the month of December 1831, and was represented in this suit by the Defendant Edward Whitley.

James Tucker, the surviving executor of the will of John Inman the husband of Sarah, having died, the Defendants John Inman Tucker, William Tucker, and John James, became the legal personal representatives of the same John Inman.

Upon the death of George Inman, in August 1838, the Plaintiffs claimed the benefit of the assignment of the 15th of April 1819, and this suit was the consequence of the claim being resisted by the legal personal representatives of John Inman.

The question in the cause was, whether this deed was binding on John Inman the husband: and it should be stated, in reference to this point, that John Inman was [341] the active trustee; that, previous to the execution of the deed of 1802, he alone had received the purchase-money of the estate: that he retained it in his possession, and the amount was, after his death, paid out of his assets.

It appeared also that the deed of 1802 was prepared by John Whitley, the trustee and the solicitor of John Inman, that the costs of it were afterwards retained out of John Inman's estate, and that the deed of 1802 and the will of Mrs. Inman were found in the possession of John Whitley after his death.

Mr. Turner and Mr. Chapman, for the Plaintiffs. The circumstances shew that John Inman acquiesced in the arrangement of 1802, and all his interest in the fund became bound by the trusts of the deed.

Again, he was a trustee under the deed. He acted under the deed and accepted the trusts, and neither he nor his representatives can now repudiate them. It is no answer for a trustee to say that he has not executed the deed of trust; if he has acted under it, and shewn his acceptance, he is equally bound by the trusts.

There is also a question of election.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Freeling, for the representatives of John Inman, insisted, that Sarah Inman had no power of disposing of her share in the fund by will; for at the date of the deed of 1802 she was a married woman, and incapable of altering her reversionary interest in a chose in action. (Purdew v. Jackson, 1 Russ. 1; and Honner v. Morton, 3 Russ. 65.) That the deed of 1802 was ineffectual, and not binding on her husband, [342] who had not executed it. That, even if he had acquiesced in it, still it could not be obligatory on him, unless it were binding on all the other parties, for otherwise there would be no mutuality; yet it was plain that if the wife had survived her husband, the deed would have been wholly ineffectual as to her. That if she were not bound by the deed, her appointees, claiming under her, could not insist on its performance.

That the deed, on the face of it, shewed that the arrangement was wholly on the part of George Inman; and that there was no trace of any contract on the part of John Inman or of his wife.

Mr. William James, for the representatives of John Whitley.

Mr. Turner, in reply.

April 18. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The deeds of January and November 1795 are admitted, and it is also admitted, that the deed of the 24th of February 1802 was executed by George Inman the son, and it appears that a will, to the effect stated, was executed by Sarah the wife of John Inman.

It is further admitted, that John Inman, during his life, principally managed the trust: that the estate was sold: that £1050 was the amount of the clear purchase-money—and that it was received by John Inman alone, who did not invest it, but that he made the payments to George Inman, and that, after his death, the amount was retained out of his assets by John Whitley, the other trustee, who was also one of his executors.

[343] It appears, also, that John Inman employed John Whitley as his solicitor, and although the evidence is not quite free from ambiguity, I think it shews that the deed of 24th of February 1802, giving the power to Sarah Inman, was prepared by John Whitley, and that the expense of preparing the same was charged to, and deducted out of the estate of John Inman, after his death. The deed itself and the will of Sarah, were found in the possession of John Whitley, who was the executor of John Inman, and the surviving trustee.

It was alleged, for the Defendants, that under the deeds of November 1795, George Inman was entitled to have the whole income applied for his support during his life, and that subject to his life interest, one moiety of the principal was absolutely vested in Sarah Inman. That neither George Inman nor John Inman and his wife had any power or authority to alter the nature of the reversionary interest vested in Sarah, and consequently, that the power alleged to be given by the deed of 24th of February 1802 was not well created.

But it appears to me, that as against the husband of Sarah and with his consent, the interest which Sarah had under the deed of 1795 might well be modified in the manner intended by the deed of 1802. By that deed, executed for reasons and under circumstances of which no sufficient explanation is given, but which may probably have been executed for the purpose of making the trust on which the purchase-money was to be held, more conformable to the trust created by the deed of January 1795, George qualified his life interest, in a manner beneficial to Sarah, and the deed contained a limitation of a moiety of the principal which was prejudicial to the contingent interest which John had in the reversionary interest of his wife. I think that with John's [344] consent, this limitation, as well as the power of disposition given to his wife, might be valid. The real question seems to be, whether John did, in fact, consent to it; and however little moral doubt there may be on the subject, yet, as he did not execute the deed to which he was a party, the Defendants found their resistance to the Plaintiffs' claim, principally, upon the defect of evidence that John ever did anything to deprive himself of the right, which, under the deed of 1795, he had to his wife's interest, in the event which happened of her dying in his lifetime.

The evidence is indeed extremely defective. I can attach but little importance to the letters which have been produced, and the entries from the books of Whitley afford of themselves but little information, and are in fact erroneous.

If any further information could be hoped for, I should be willing to direct inquiries respecting the custody of the deed of 1802, and of the will of Sarah, and the concurrence of John in the arrangements intended to be thereby made. But upon the case as it now stands, resting upon the instruments and the presumptions arising from the relations between the parties, and the facts that John Inman acted principally in the execution of the trusts, and that the deed and will were found in the possession of the executor of John, I think, that in the absence of further inquiry and information, John must be deemed to have acquiesced in the arrangement, and accepted the trust for the benefit of his wife's appointees.

[345] BARWELL v. BROOKS. May 7, 1844.

[For subsequent proceedings, see 8 Beav. 121.]

Within twelve months after payment of a bill of costs, a client presented a petition for its taxation, but the petition having specified no items of overcharge, no order could be made. The twelve months having then expired, the Court refused to allow the petition to stand over, for the purpose of amendment, by specifying the items.

A solicitor's bill having been paid on the 15th of April 1843, a petition was on the 11th of April 1844 presented for its taxation under the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73. The petition did not specify any items in the bill of which the correctness or propriety was challenged. The petition came on upon the 7th of May, and, as no taxation could be ordered on account of this omission,

Mr. Kindersley asked that the petition might stand over, with liberty to amend by specifying the items complained of.

Mr. Turner. Twelve months have now elapsed since the payment, and no order can therefore be made for taxation. (In re Downes, 5 Beav. 425.) The Court will not, by allowing the petition to stand over, extend the time limited by the statute. The Petitioner will not be without remedy; his present solicitor is liable for neglecting to state the items.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I must yield to this objection, and I am inclined to think that I must not give leave to amend. After payment, the items complained of ought to be distinctly stated in the petition. In a former case I came to the conclusion that it was sufficient to present the petition for taxation within the twelve months (Sayer v. Wagstaff, 5 Beav. 415); but if the Court were to permit a party to present an ineffective [346] petition, and then, after the expiration of twelve months, allow him to make out a substantive case by amendment, it would be in effect enlarging the time limited by the statute.

As at present advised, I think that to obtain a taxation after payment the client must present an effective petition within the twelve months, and that a petition on which no order can be made cannot, after the twelve months have expired, be allowed to be amended for the purpose of making it effective.

On a subsequent day,

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS said he remained of the same opinion.

[346] BRADSTOCK v. WHATLEY. June 5, 1844.

After a delay of between six and seven weeks, the Court declined, ex parte, to grant to the Plaintiff liberty to enter an appearance for a Defendant under the 8th Order of August 1841.

The subpoena in this case was served on the 20th of April 1844, and on the 5th of June following (after an interval of between six and seven weeks), the Plaintiff applied ex parte for liberty to enter an appearance for the Defendant under the 8th Order of the 26th of August 1841. (Ord. Can. 165.)

Mr. Bevir, in support of the application.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] said, that, after the delay which had occurred, he could not make the order; but [347] the Plaintiff might either serve a subpoena again or give the Defendant notice of the application. (See Edmonds v. Nicoll, 6 Beav. 334.)

The Plaintiff afterwards served the Defendant with notice of the motion, and the order was thereupon subsequently made.

[347] M'KEVERAKIN v. CORT. June 12, 1844.

The solicitor of the Suitor's Fund appointed, under the 28th Order of the 26th of October 1842, guardian ad litem of a lunatic Defendant not so found by inquisition.

Mr. Baily, for the Plaintiffs, moved, under the 28th Order of the 26th of October 1842 (Ordines Can. 217), for the appointment of a guardian ad litem of the Defendant John Cort, who was a lunatic, but had not been so found by inquisition. He cited Brooks v. Jobling (2 Hare, 155).

It appearing, by affidavit, that the Defendant was of unsound mind, that the subpoena had been served, and that no writ de lunatico inquirendo had been issued against the Defendant,

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS appointed Mr. Johnson, the solicitor of the Suitor's Fund, guardian to the Defendant John Cort, by whom he might appear and answer the Plaintiff's bill and defend the suit. (See note to Needham v. Smith, 6 Beav. 130.)

[348] HEWETT v. FOSTER. June 26, 1844.

[S. C. 8 Jur. 769. Explained and distinguished, Easton v. Landor, 1892, 62 L. J. Ch. 164; [1892], W. N. 176. Held, not to be modern practice, In re Skinner [1904], 1 Ch. 289.]

A trustee was declared liable for a breach of trust, and was ordered to pay the costs up to the hearing. He complied with the decree. Held, that he was entitled to his costs of the subsequent proceedings for clearing and distributing the fund.

The Defendant Hewett was the sole executor of the testatrix, and Foster and Hewett were trustees of the residue for the Plaintiffs.

They committed a breach of trust, by selling out the trust fund and lending it to the Defendant Hewett. At the original hearing they were decreed to replace it, and to pay the costs (6 Beavan, 259), which was accordingly done. It was referred to the Master to ascertain whether any of the debts, funeral expenses, and legacies of the testatrix were unpaid: to ascertain the class of children entitled, and whether their father was of ability to maintain them. The Defendants attended these inquiries before the Master.

The cause came on for further directions, and the question was, whether the trustees were entitled to their costs subsequent to the decree.

Mr. G. Turner and Mr. Beavan, for the Plaintiffs, suggested that, as the whole litigation had been created by the breach of trust, the trustees were not entitled to the subsequent costs.

Mr. Chandless, for other parties.

Mr. Kindersley, for Foster the trustee, was not heard by

[349] THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS, who said that he thought the trustee clearly entitled to have his subsequent costs. (See Pride v. Fooks, 2 Beavan, 430.)

[349] NIXON v. FEW. July 3, 5, 1844.

Whether a guardian ad litem can be assigned to an infant resident within the jurisdiction, without bringing him into Court or by means of a commission, quære.

Mr. Simpson applied for an order for the appointment, without their personal appearance in Court or a commission, of a guardian ad litem to infants. Some of them were resident within, and some out of the jurisdiction. (Shuttleworth v. Shuttleworth, 2 Hare, 147; Smith v. Palmer, 3 Beav. 10.) As to those resident within the jurisdiction, he cited Drant v. Vause (1 Y. & C. (C. C.), 580; and see Hill v. Smith, 1 Mad. 290; and Green v. Badley, antè, p. 271), as an authority for the application, in which case such an order had been made by the Lord Chancellor.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I will speak to the Lord Chancellor on the point. It is every day's practice to bring infants into Court for the purpose of assigning them guardians. I feel reluctant to make the order at the present moment.

Mr. Simpson again mentioned this case.

July 5. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS said he had not been able to communicate with the Lord Chancellor; but that he [350] had no objection to make the order as to the infants who were out of the jurisdiction, for that had frequently been done before. That as to the infants who were within the jurisdiction, it was evident that if, without some special grounds, the order was made, the old practice of bringing infants into Court for the purpose of assigning them guardians would be entirely subverted.

Mr. Simpson said he would be contented with an order limited to those who were out of the jurisdiction, and the order was so made.

NOTE.—See 27th Order of 26th October 1842, Ordines Can. 217.

[350] THOMPSON v. THOMPSON. July 5, 1844.

A sole Plaintiff became insolvent. His assignee filed a supplemental bill, but before appearance, obtained an order to dismiss the supplemental bill alone, without costs.

Held, regular.

Before appearance, a Plaintiff may dismiss his bill without costs.

The original bill was filed by Sarah Thompson. She became insolvent, whereupon her assignee filed a supplemental bill, but before the Defendant had appeared thereto, the assignee obtained an order for dismissing the supplemental bill without costs.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Hardy moved to discharge the order, insisting that it was wrong to dismiss the supplemental bill without dismissing the original bill at the same time. They complained that the Defendant had been put to expense by this mode of proceeding.

Mr. Elderton, contra.

Horlock v. Priestley (8 Sim. 621) was referred to.

[351] THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] said, that before the supplemental bill had been filed, the Defendant might have moved that the assignee should file a supplemental bill within a given time, or that the bill should be dismissed. (See Lord Huntingtower v. Sherborn, 5 Beav. 380.) That, by dismissing the supplemental bill without costs, the Defendant was left in the same situation as before, and that he did not see any irregularity in dismissing the supplemental bill without costs, there having been no appearance entered at the time. (1 Smith's Prac. 422; Wyatt's Pr. Reg. 60, 61.)

By arrangement, it was agreed that the original bill should also be dismissed without costs.

Where the husband alone incurs a forfeiture under the Marriage Act (4 G. 4, c. 76, s. 23), the Court has no authority to order any settlement of the wife's property on the issue of the wife by any subsequent marriage.

The Defendant, John Mullay, having married Catherine Cooper in fraud of the Marriage Act (4 G. 4, c. 76), an information was filed by the Attorney-General, under the twenty-third section of that Act, to have it declared that John Mullay had forfeited all interest in the present and future property of his wife, and to have the same properly settled.

At the hearing, such forfeiture was declared, and it was referred to the Master to ascertain the property, and to approve of a proper settlement. (4 Russ. 329.) The Master had approved of a settlement whereby the property was settled exclusively on the wife, and the issue of her present marriage.

[352] Mr. Lovat and Mr. Sheffield appeared for the different parties.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS inquired whether there ought not to be some provision made for the issue of any future marriage of the wife, and said he would read the Act before he approved the settlement.

July 6. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] said that on reading the Act he found that under the circumstances of this case it prevented his making any provision for the issue of any second marriage, and the settlement must therefore be executed as approved by the Master.

NOTE.—By the twenty-third section, where the marriage of a minor is procured by a false oath or knowingly without the consent of the parent or guardian, the Court, upon the information of the Attorney-General, may declare a forfeiture of all interest in any property accruing to the party so offending by force of such marriage, and to order the property to be secured "for the benefit of the innocent party, or of the issue of the marriage, or of any of them, in such manner as the said Court shall think fit," &c, "and if both the parties so contracting marriage shall, in the judgment of the Court, be guilty of any such offence as aforesaid, it shall be lawful for the said Court to settle and secure such property, or any part thereof, immediately for the benefit of the issue of the marriage, subject to such provisions for the offending parties, by way of maintenance or otherwise, as the said Court, under the particular circumstances of the case, shall think reasonable, regard being had to the benefit of the issue of the marriage during the lives of their parents, and of the issue of the parties respectively by any future marriage, or of the parties themselves, in case either of them shall survive the other."

[353] RADBURN v. JERVIS. July 5, 8, 1844.

Whether the modern rule of practice, that motions of course may be made on any day in or out of term, is universal, or is subject to any qualifications, quære.

The Master having made his general report,

Mr. Willcock, at the expiration of eight days, moved to confirm it absolute. The motion was made out of term, on a day which was neither a seal day nor the continuation of the seal. He cited Lord Harborough v. Wartnaby (1 Phil. 364), in which the Lord Chancellor is stated to have laid down, that all motions of course may be made out of term, as well as in term, on any day, whether a seal day or not.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS said he had some reluctance in making the order, but that if the Lord Chancellor had laid down the rule as broadly as it was stated, he would follow it with pleasure. That he was, however, desirous of communicating with the Lord Chancellor on the subject.

July 8. Mr. Willcock again mentioned the case, and admitted that the rule must receive some qualification, as where the personal liberty of a party would be affected; but he said that this case was not of that description.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] observed, that he thought that the generality of the rule ought to receive some qualification; that, though there did not appear to be any great objection to its application to the present case, still he did not like to go on acting upon this general [354] rule, without knowing whether it was to receive any qualification; and that therefore he would not make the order at present.

The case was not mentioned again.

[S. C. 13 L. Ch. 416. For other proceedings, see 7 Beav. 301, 323; 11 Beav. 17. Followed, Hopkinson v. Lord Burghley, 1867, L. R. 2 Ch. 449.]

One member of a club, on behalf of himself and the rest, sued two other members, to recover back monies belonging to the club. It having been determined that the other individual members were not necessary parties: Held, that the Defendants could not resist the production of documents in their possession, on the ground that the other members had an interest in them.

A Plaintiff ought not to use for any collateral purpose, documents ordered by the Court to be produced for the purposes of the suit.

This case is reported on the argument of the demurrers. (Ante, p. 301 and 323.) The Defendants put in their answer, admitting that they had in their possession a number of documents relating to the matters in the bill mentioned. The answer, however, stated, that the Plaintiff "was the attorney of Plaintiffs, in several proceedings at law, instituted by different creditors of the Alliance Club, at the instigation of the Plaintiff or his partner, against the Defendants as members of the committee of the said club," which proceedings were afterwards more particularly stated, and one of which actions was stated to be still pending. They claimed to have such particulars protected from the inspection of the Plaintiff under the authority of the Court.

Mr. Cameron now moved for the production of the documents.

Mr. Purvis contended, first, that the other members were equally interested with the Defendants in the documents, and that an order for production could not be made in their absence. Production was refused in Murray v. Walter (Cr. & Ph. 114), and in Lopez v. Deacon (6 Beavan, 254), where the documents were in the possession of an agent, on behalf of the Defendant, and persons not parties to the cause. (See Taylor v. Rundell, Cr. & Ph. 111.)

Secondly, that the object of the Plaintiff was not to use the documents for the legitimate purposes of this suit, but to assist in the actions brought, and to be brought, by the creditors against the Defendants.

Mr. Cameron, in reply. The question of want of parties has been disposed of by the decision on the demurrers. The Plaintiff sues on behalf of himself and all the other members; therefore every person interested in the documents is before the Court.

As to the other point, the Plaintiff is willing to undertake not to use the documents for the purposes apprehended by the Defendants.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS having, during the argument, referred to Few v. Guppy (Hare on Discovery, 124, and Wigram on Discovery, p. 245), said he would consider the points.

July 31. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. In this case, I think that the Defendants are bound to produce, or to permit, the inspection of the documents [356] in their possession. I think that they cannot refuse the production on the ground that other persons not parties to the cause have an interest in them, it having been determined that those other persons are not, under the circumstances of this case, necessary parties to the cause.

It was objected that the Plaintiff is an attorney in actions brought against the Defendants by different creditors of the club whose affairs are the subject of this suit, and that he may use the documents sought to be produced, as evidence of the demands which those creditors have against the club.

I think that the Plaintiff ought not to use the documents for any such collateral object; and as he has offered, if I should think it right, to undertake not to use the documents, or any copy of them, for that purpose, I shall make the order for the production or inspection of these documents, on his undertaking to that effect.

[357] SMITH v. THE EARL OF EFFINGHAM. March 11, 13, May 6, 1844.

[S. C. 8 Jur. 479. Affirmed on appeal, July 6, 1846, see subsequent proceedings, 10 Beav. 378, 589.]

In 1817, a tenant for life of freehold estates, subject to long outstanding terms, granted a personal annuity to the Plaintiff, secured by warrant of attorney, on which judgment was forthwith entered up and docketed. Afterwards, in 1818 and 1819, he created other incumbrances, two of which were by demises of the estate. The Plaintiff did not sue out any elegit till 1822, when he did so. The inquisition being duly returned, he commenced an action of ejectment, which he discontinued, in consequence of the outstanding terms. In a suit to which the Plaintiff was no party, the priorities of the other incumbrancers were declared. The Plaintiff, within twenty years from the last payment of the annuity, filed this bill against all the other parties, to have it declared that he was entitled to stand as first incumbrancer; that the decree, &c., might be altered, or that the Plaintiff might be at liberty to proceed at law, and that the Defendants might be restrained from setting up the terms. One of the defences was, that the Plaintiff's annuity was usurious. The Court held that the Plaintiff was not barred by the proceedings in the suit, and retained the bill for a year, giving the Plaintiff leave to bring an action for the recovery of the freehold, and restraining the Defendants from setting up the terms; and also (though not specifically asked by the bill) from setting up the Statute of Limitations. The Court also refused to interfere with the application of the rents in the meantime, or to grant inquiries as to the validity of the Plaintiff's charge, holding that prima facie credit was to be given to the judgment, and that if the Defendants had any equitable case to make against the judgment, they ought to adopt proceedings of their own to establish that fact. In a suit in which the priorities of different incumbrancers on an estate were determined, a receiver had been appointed. A. B., who claimed to be first incumbrancer, not having been made a party to that suit, filed a bill of his own to establish his right. Held, that the receiver was not a necessary party, and but for the decision in Lewis v. Lord Zouche, 2 Simons, 388, he would have been considered an improper party.

This bill was filed by Mr. Smith and Mr. Dudgeon, claiming to be the first incumbrancer on the estate of a Mr. Primrose, which was subject to a number of other incumbrances, and had been dealt with in a suit to which the Plaintiffs had not been made parties. The material circumstances were as follows:—

The Defendant, Francis Ward Primrose, was tenant for life of the freehold estates in question, subject, however, to an outstanding satisfied term of 500 years, and also to another outstanding satisfied term of 1000 years. He was also entitled to a copyhold estate, in respect of which the Plaintiff made a claim by his bill; but which, having been abandoned at the Bar, it is not necessary further to notice.

[358] The Defendant, Mr. Primrose, being so entitled, in consideration, as it was said, of £2660, to him paid by the Plaintiff Dudgeon, executed an indenture dated the 15th of November 1817, and thereby granted to Dudgeon an annuity of £380 for the life of the grantor, and by the deed covenanted to pay the annuity. On the same day, Mr. Primrose executed a power of attorney, authorising certain persons, by confession or otherwise, to suffer judgment to be entered up against him, in an action of debt, for £5320 and costs, at the suit of Dudgeon, subject to defeasance on due payment of the annuity.

Pursuant to this warrant of attorney, judgment was signed, and the docket entered on the 15th of December 1817.

Under these circumstances, Mr. Dudgeon having the judgment, and under it a general security, but no specific lien on the land, Mr. Primrose granted another annuity to William Brown, and by indenture, dated the 9th of December 1818, made between Mr. Primrose of the first part, Brown of the second part, and Edward Howard of the third part, Primrose, in consideration of £5000 paid to him by Brown, granted to Brown a rent charge of £600, chargeable upon and yearly issuing out of his freehold and copyhold estate, for 100 years if Primrose should so long live, with power of distress and entry, and a demise to Howard, as trustee, for better securing the annuity. On the death of William Brown, the annuity became vested in the Defendant, Robert Brown, his representative, who was, by the bill, alleged to be a trustee thereof for the Defendants the Earls of Effingham and Rosebery, and William Harvey.

[359] Again, on the 2d of August 1819, Primrose, by indenture dated on that day, in consideration of £350 paid to him by Henry Pearson, granted to Pearson an annuity of £50 for the life of the grantor, and covenanted to pay the same; and for the securing that annuity, Primrose executed a warrant of attorney to confess judgment, which was accordingly entered up in or as of Hilary term 1820. This annuity had become vested in the Defendant, James Henry Mann.

On the 16th of August 1819 Primrose, in consideration of £700 paid to him by Richard Brydges, granted to Brydges an annuity of £100 for the life of the grantor, and covenanted to pay the same, and, for better securing the payment thereof, executed a warrant of attorney to confess judgment, which was accordingly entered up in Hilary term 1820. This annuity had become vested in the Defendant James William Smith.

And on the 7th of December 1819 Mr. Primrose executed an indenture of that date, made between himself of the first part, Edward Howard of the second part, John Waite of the third part, and James Gibbs of the fourth part, and thereby, in consideration of £1400 paid by Waite, granted to Howard, in trust for Waite, an annuity of £200 for 100 years, if Primrose should so long live; and for the purpose of better securing the same, demised his freehold estate to Gibbs for ninety-nine years, if Primrose should so long live, on trust for securing the payment of the annuity. It was said, that after the death of John Waite, this annuity and the securities for the payment thereof were assigned to the Defendant Mr. Bateman and Mr. Shepherd, for the benefit of the Earls of Rosebery and Effingham and William Harvey.

[360] Thus, it appeared, that before the year 1820, Mr. Primrose had granted five several annuities, of which three, viz., the annuities granted to Dudgeon, Pearson, and Brydges, were secured by grant, covenant and judgment only, whilst the two annuities, granted to Brown and Waite respectively, were secured by demises of the estate.

Dudgeon's annuity was paid up to the 15th of November 1820, but afterwards became in arrear; and it was in this state of things, and on the 6th of November 1822 that Dudgeon, by Mr. Alderson, his attorney, caused a writ of elegit to be issued on his judgment, and there having been a writ of inquisition duly returned, he commenced an action of ejectment to recover possession of a moiety of the land. It was said, that this action to recover possession of a moiety of the land was stopped, in consequence of a discovery of the outstanding terms to which the life-estate of Mr. Primrose was subject. However this might be, the action was non prosequi in Hilary term 1826, and it did not appear that Mr. Dudgeon took any further step for enforcing payment of his annuity. He assigned it to his Co-plaintiff Smith in November 1838, and this bill was filed on the 7th of March 1839, between eighteen and nineteen years after the last payment of the annuity made to Dudgeon.

In the meantime, however, a bill was in 1823 filed in this Court by Robert Brown, the executor of William Brown, the grantee of the annuity of £600, and by the Earls of Effingham and Rosebery, William Harvey, Lord Dalmeny, and by Messrs. Bateman and Shepherd, against Howard and Gibbs, Shaw, Hermon and Chappel, George Walpole Clement, Anthony Pierce, Henry Pearson, Richard Brydges, and Mr. Primrose, whereby, after stating the deed of the 9th of December 1818, and a deed [361] endorsed thereon, dated the 7th of March 1822, it was prayed, that the freehold estate of Mr. Primrose, for the residue of the demise created by the indenture of the 9th of December 1818, might be assigned, and that all the right and estate of Howard under the same indenture might be assigned and conveyed to such person as the Plaintiff Robert Brown should direct, and that all proper parties might join in the necessary deeds for so doing; and that Howard and Gibbs might be decreed to execute the indenture of the 7th of March 1822, and to deliver up to the Plaintiff, Mr. Jones Bateman, all the deeds belonging to the estate; and that all necessary declarations might be made and directions given.

This bill was three times amended; and it was not brought on to be heard till the 26th of July 1830, before which time, and in Easter term 1829, Brydges, to whom the annuity of £100 had been granted, filed his bill, praying for a declaration that the estates in question were subject to a charge or lien in his favour, or that he might, by aid of the Court, have the benefit of his judgment.

On the 26th of July 1830 it was by the Vice-Chancellor declared, in both the causes, that Brown, in respect of his annuity of £600, was entitled to possession of the deeds anterior to his deed of charge, and the Defendants, Shaw, Hermon and Chappell, were ordered to deliver the same deeds to Brown, and the Defendant Howard was ordered to assign, to such person as Brown should direct, the term of ninety-nine years vested in him, and Howard and Gibbs were ordered to execute the deed of the 7th of March 1822. And it was declared that Brown had the first charge on the life interest of Primrose, under the indenture of the 9th of December 1818; that Mr. Bateman, in trust for the Earl of Rose[362]-bery, had the second charge on the same life interest, under the indentures of the 7th of December 1819 and the 7th of March 1822; that Brydges, a Plaintiff in the first, and a Defendant in the second cause, had the third charge, by virtue of his judgment; and it was declared, that a conveyance, dated the 22d of May 1821, was subject to such charges. Certain accounts were ordered, and further directions reserved.

After the Master's report, and after certain supplemental bills had been filed, the causes came on to be heard again; and by a decretal order, made on the 23d of July 1832, after directing the application of a balance found to be in the hands of the Earl of Effingham and Mr. Harvey, it was ordered that Brown should continue in possession of the estates, and out of the rents retain, in the first place, certain costs, and in the second place, the annuity to which he was entitled under the indenture of the 9th of December 1818, and, in the third place, to pay certain costs of the Earl of Rosebery, Mr. Bateman, Mr. Shepherd, and of Lord Dalmeny; and, in the fourth place, to keep down the annuity created by the indenture of the 7th of December 1819; and, in the fifth place, to pay to the representatives of Brydges their costs of the suit; and, in the sixth place, to keep down the incumbrance under the judgment obtained by Brydges in Hilary term 1820; and, in the seventh place, to pay to Henry Pearson his costs of the suit; and in the eighth place, to keep down the incumbrance of Henry Pearson, under his judgment obtained in Hilary term 1820.

By a subsequent order, dated the 31st of May 1837, Gardiner Chapman was appointed receiver of the estates, and he was directed to receive the rents and apply them [363] in the manner directed by the order of the 23d of July 1832.

It should be stated that Messrs. Howard and Gibbs acted for both parties in the grants of the several annuities, and that Mr. Alderson acted as attorney and solicitor for Dudgeon in the matter of the elegit in 1822, and for the Plaintiffs in the suit of Brown v. Howard.

On the 7th of March 1839 Smith and Dudgeon his assignor, filed this bill against Mr. Primrose and the several persons claiming to be incumbrancers on his life-estate. The bill alleged that the Plaintiffs in the two previous suits had, from fraudulent motives, omitted to make him a party to those suits, though they had notice both actual and constructive (through their solicitors) of his incumbrance; and it prayed for a declaration that the Plaintiff Smith was entitled, in equity, to stand as first incumbrancer on the estates for his annuity and the arrears thereof, and that an account might be taken of what was due for such arrears, and that for the purpose of paying the same and securing the future payment of the annuity, the interest of Mr. Primrose in the estates might be sold, or that the Plaintiffs might be let into possession. The bill also prayed that Chapman, the receiver, who had been appointed receiver of the same estate in the other cause, might pay to Smith the balance of rents in his hands, and might be discharged.

The bill also prayed that it might be taken to be a bill in the nature of a bill of review, and supplemental to the said cause of Brown v. Howard, and the causes connected therewith, and that, if necessary, the decrees and orders of the 26th of July 1830, the 23d of July 1832, and the 31st of May 1837, and the other orders, might be reviewed or varied; or that the Plaintiffs [364] might be permitted to proceed at law for the recovery of the said annuity of £380, and the arrears thereof, notwithstanding the order of the 31st of May 1837, and the appointment of receiver, and that the Defendants might be restrained from setting up the said terms or either of them, or any other legal estate, at such proceedings at law; and that the receiver might, in the meantime, be directed not to make any payment to any of the Defendants in this cause, and for further relief, &c.

The Defendants, amongst other things, insisted on the invalidity of the Plaintiffs' security, and that it was usurious.

Sir William Follett (Solicitor-General), and Mr. Wilcock, for the Plaintiffs (the arguments are ex relatione), abandoned all claim on the copyhold estates; but contended that it was not necessary to prove that the Defendants had actual notice of the Plaintiffs' judgment; for Gibbs acted as solicitor for both the grantor and the grantees of the annuities; and that therefore the Defendants must have had notice, actual or constructive, and could not protect themselves by getting in an outstanding legal estate; Maddox v. Maddox (1 Ves. sen. 60); that the annuities were granted at comparatively short intervals; and "where one transaction is closely followed by and connected with another," notice to the solicitor is notice to the client, and it will not be restricted to one transaction; Hargreaves v. Rothwell (1 Keen, 154), Fuller v. Bennet (2 Hare, 394). That, where a judgment is entered up against the owner of lands of which the legal estate is outstanding in a trustee or mortgagee, a purchaser with notice of the judgment will be bound [365] by such notice, although the creditor may not have taken out execution on his judgment; Tunstall v. Trappes (3 Sim. 286).

That the lapse of time since the annuity was granted was no bar to this suit, within the provisions of the Statute of Limitations (3 & 4 W. 4, c. 27, s. 40), as the Plaintiffs' annuity had been paid up to the 15th of November 1820, and the bill was filed on the 7th of March 1839.

That it was alleged by the Defendants, that the transaction under which the Plaintiffs claimed was usurious; but that there was no evidence to support that allegation. That it was also alleged, that the Plaintiffs' judgment had not been revived by scire facias as required by the statute of Westminster (13 Ed. 1, c. 18), but a clause in the warrant of attorney made any revival unnecessary; Morris v. Jones (2 Barn. & Cres. 232), Hiscocks v. Kemp (3 Adol. & Ellis, 676), and Morgan v. Burgess (1 Dowl. Prac. Ca. 850, N. S.), where the agreement not to revive was made by parol.

That the non-registration of the Plaintiffs' judgment as required by the late statutes (1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 19, and 2 & 3 Vict. c. 11), was immaterial, as the Defendants had notice, and, on the assignment of Mr. Brown's annuity, a bond of indemnity, dated the 1st of October 1830, had been taken by the Earl of Effingham and William Harvey against the Plaintiffs' claim.

That an elegit having been sued out by the Plaintiff, and an inquisition and return made, Tidd's Practice (Tidd's Prac. 1036, 9 Ed. c. 41), [366] he had a right to stand as the first incumbrancer; Neate v. The Duke of Marlborough (2 Myl. & Craig, 407), Lord Dillon v. Plaskett (2 Bligh, 239, N. S.). That the discovery of the outstanding terms of 500 and 1000 years had induced him to enter a nolle prosequi in the actions of ejectment which he had commenced. As to these outstanding terms, that Mr. Primrose, as tenant for life, had no power to direct any assignment of them to be made for the benefit of any of the Defendants, so that Mr. Brown and Mr. Waite had no right to protection from them; they were equitable incumbrancers with notice of the Plaintiff's judgment, and yet in the suits instituted they had arranged the priorities of their incumbrances without reference to the judgment of the Plaintiff. That a party coming to this Court for relief upon a legal title could not be driven back to a Court of law; and that any person obstructed by the receiver in pursuing his rights might come to this Court for relief, and make such receiver a party; Lewis v. Lord Zouche (2 Simons, 388). The Plaintiff therefore asked for an account of the rents for six years; and that the receiver might pay to the Plaintiff one-half of the rents of the freehold estates until his annuity was satisfied; and that the Plaintiff might be declared entitled to a lien, and that the other incumbrancers had notice of the Plaintiff's claim. If this was not granted, the Plaintiff then asked that the legal impediment to proceedings at law might be removed, and that the Plaintiff might be allowed to substantiate his claim, without disturbing what had been done under the former decrees; that the Defendants might be restrained from setting up the Statute of Limitations; and that the receiver might pay the rents into Court.

[367] They also cited Townshend v. Askeu (referred to in 3 Myl. & Cr. 410, note, and in 2 Sugden's Vendors (10th ed.), 394, note (n.)), and Stileman v. Ashdown (2 Atk. 477).

Mr. Tinney, for Mr. Chapman the receiver, appointed in the causes of Brown v. Howard and Brydges v. Howard, contended that he was not a necessary or proper party to this suit, and asked for the immediate payment of his costs.

Mr. Cooper and Mr. Cooke, for Robert Brown, the personal representative of William Brown. Neither the Plaintiff's warrant of attorney nor the judgment, though docketed, constituted a lien either in law or equity upon the equitable estate; Powell on Mortgages (vol. ii. (6th ed.), 608), Sugden's Vendors (vol. ii. (10th ed.), 385). They only enabled the Plaintiff to establish a lien, but no lien was obtained till after Mr. Brown's annuity was granted, for Mr. Brown's annuity was granted in 1818, and no execution was sued out by the Plaintiff till the 6th of November 1823. From 1820 till the 7th of March 1839, no steps were taken by the Plaintiff to compel payment, and the delay is a sufficient ground for refusing relief; Champion v. Rigby (1 Russ. & My. 539, and Tamlyn, 421, affirmed by Lord Cottenham, 20th March 1840), Gregory v. Gregory (Coop. 201, Jac. 631). This Court had already refused to interfere to restrain the receiver from paying the rents as directed in the other suits; Smith v. Lord Effingham (2 Beav. 232).

The 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110 (sect. 19), required that all judgments should be registered; otherwise, they are not to affect lands, as to purchasers, mortgagees, and creditors who [368] were further protected by the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 11 (sects. 2 and 5), from all judgments not registered. In Simmons v. Pettit (V.-C. E. 19th February 1844) a bill was filed by a mortgagee to foreclose his mortgage, he failed in his attempt to tack a judgment; which, though prior in date, had not been registered at the time of a subsequent mortgage. In this case, therefore, the Plaintiff ought to have registered his judgment, before he applied to this Court for assistance. The judgment roll also ought to have been proved complete, and the award of an elegit ought to have been added. Chitty Prac. (4th ed. 283), Runninton on Ejectment (page 330), Adams on Ejectment (2d ed. 267), Selwyn's Nisi Prius (vol. ii. 745, 8th ed.), Starkie's Evidence (vol. ii. 410, 3d ed.), Ramsbottom v. Buckhurst (2 Mau. & Sel. 565), Neale v. The Duke of Marlborough (3 My. & Craig, 407, 409, 413, 416, 417).

There is no evidence to shew that the Defendants had notice of the Plaintiff's judgment at the time they advanced their money. They may therefore protect themselves by an outstanding estate: Sug. Ven. and Purch. (vol. iii. 418).

This can only be considered as an ejectment suit to recover a moiety of the estate; but even under the Statute of Frauds (29 Car. 2, c. 3), execution might be sued out against the lands in the hands of a trustee at the time of execution sued. Under the circumstances, therefore, the Court will do no more than remove the terms out of the way of any proceeding at law; and as the Plaintiff is no more than an execution creditor, it will make no [369] order affecting the rents. In Sharp v. Key (8 Mee. & Wels. 379), where rent became due after the delivery of a writ of elegit to the sheriff, but before the inquisition was taken thereon, it was held that the execution creditor was not entitled to the rent.

Mr. Corrie, for James Henry Mann, complained that the decree made in the suits of Brown v. Howard and Brydges v. Howard, declaring the priorities of the incumbrancers, was erroneous, and submitted that it ought now to be reviewed and varied; West v. Skip (1 Ves. sen. 244), Hamilton v. Houghton (2 Bligh (O. S.), 169). He contended that Mr. Mann was entitled to stand prior to Messrs. Waite and Brydges, who had notice of his claim. He also cited Foster v. Blackstone (1 Myl. & Keen, 297), Davis v. Lord Strathmore (16 Ves. 419).

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Parry, for Mr. Bateman, Mr. Shepherd and Mr. Smith, argued that the judgment would only operate against the trust estate of which the trustee was seised at the time of execution sued (29 Car. 2, c. 3, s. 10); and for that reason a judgment creditor who desired to enforce his security against his debtor's equitable interest in freehold estate, could not file a bill till he had sued out an edgūt; Neate v. Duke of Marlborough (3 Myl. & Craig, 407). That the Plaintiff came here on his legal title, and not, as assumed, upon an equitable title; and that the only right he had was, to have the terms removed out of the way of his obtaining legal relief. That before the Court granted any relief, there should be an enquiry to ascertain under what circumstances the Plaintiff's annuity was granted, and why it was not paid or provided for under the former suits of Brown v. Howard [370] and Brydges v. Howard. They also cited Whitworth v. Gaugain (Cr. & Ph. 325).

Mr. Turner and Mr. Kenyon, for the Earl of Effingham, Lord Rosebery and William Harvey, asked that the bill might be dismissed against Lord Rosebery with costs, as he had ceased to have any interest in the premises; and as to the Earl of Effingham and William Harvey, they were trustees for Mr. Primrose, who was out of the jurisdiction of the Court. They argued that a judgment creditor had no such right as that insisted on by this bill; that his right was legal, and similar to that of a legal mortgagee, who could not file a bill to get legal possession of the estate, though he might come to a Court of Equity to foreclose. That this Court would never entertain a bill purely declaratory as to the right of parties, and would not entertain a bill by a judgment creditor, unless there was a prior incumbrancer who prevented the judgment creditor from availing himself of his right at law. That the Court dealt with a judgment where it intervened in the administration of assets, only because it was considered an impediment, which the Court must necessarily remove; for the same reason when the Court sold an estate, it would also interpose on behalf of a judgment creditor; but that a judgment creditor had no right either to ask this Court for the sale of an estate, or to enforce the judgment, which was the province of a Court of law. The Plaintiff rested his claim upon his legal title; and no equitable relief could be given, unless the Plaintiff put his title in the power of the Court; Aston v. Lord Exeter (6 Ves. 288), Baker v. Harwood (7 Sim. 373. See also Bear v. Ward, Jac. 194; and Hylton v. Morgan, 6 Ves. 293), and that the circumstances creating a suspicion that this was not a legal [371] transaction were sufficient to induce the Court to refuse any relief.

That the Plaintiff had been guilty of great laches and neglect; for nineteen years had elapsed since Mr. Dudgeon brought the ejectment, and no attempt had been made to put the judgment in force: and there was also no evidence to shew when the outstanding terms were discovered. That in March 1833 a bill was filed by Mr. Alderson, as the solicitor for Mr. Brown, to recover the title-deeds; and in 1836 Mr. Alderson was acting as the attorney for Mr. Dudgeon, in the action of ejectment; the Plaintiff must therefore have had full notice of the proceedings in the other suits, and having neglected to prosecute his claim, the Court would not now assist him.

Sir William Follett, in reply. The Royal assent to the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 11 was given after the institution of this suit. The Act was prospective, and did not affect purchasers, mortgagees or creditors having incumbrances, and it did not say that a security could not be enforced, unless it was registered.

Curtis v. Curtis (2 Bro. C. C. 619), and Stonehewer v. Thompson (2 Atk. 440), were also cited.

May 6. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. As the Plaintiff Dudgeon was no party to any of the proceedings in the other suits, he is not bound by them. He stands prior in point of time, and in all other circumstances equal, to Pearson and Brydges, who had the benefit of the proceedings after the incumbrance of [372] Waite, who, though subsequent in point of time, had a specific lien on the property. If the Plaintiffs had admitted the priority of the charges of Brown and Waite, I should have thought it necessary to direct some enquiries for the purpose of enabling them, if the facts should warrant it, to take priority before the other charges of the like nature with theirs.

But their counsel having at the Bar claimed less than is demanded by the bill, the Plaintiffs still insist that they are, as to the freeholds or a moiety thereof, entitled, at law, to priority before the incumbrances of Brown and Waite, and they allege that the ejectment commenced in 1822, so far as regards Brown and Waite, might have been successfully prosecuted, and it would have been prosecuted, if it had not been for the outstanding satisfied terms, which were in existence at the dates of the grant to Dudgeon and of his judgment.

The Plaintiffs having in their bill prayed a declaration of their title in equity, and having by their bill only asked for relief consequential upon that title, have, in argument, rested their case upon a legal title, of which they are unable to avail themselves without the assistance of a Court of Equity, by reason of the outstanding terms. They have not directly asked for such assistance, but still pray for a declaration of their right in equity.

It is, however, clear that even if they have such legal title as they allege, they could not assert it at law, without the assistance of this Court; and it appears to me that as the judgment was signed, the writ of elegit issued and the inquisition returned, and as there is no evidence of the judgment having been satisfied, the [373] Plaintiffs may have a right to some relief in this Court. I think, therefore, that I ought not to refuse to them an opportunity of establishing their right at law, if they can; and therefore I shall retain this bill for a year, giving leave to the Plaintiffs to bring their ejectment for the recovery of the freehold; but restraining them from taking out execution on any judgment which they may obtain, and restraining the Defendants from setting up the outstanding terms, which were satisfied at the date of Dudgeon's security, and also from setting up the Statute of Limitations, but leaving them the benefit of all other defences which they may have.

It was urged at the Bar, that I ought to cause some enquiry to be made, as to the manner and circumstances in and under which the Plaintiff's claim arose, so as to satisfy myself that it had an equitable foundation, before I restrained the Defendants from setting up the Statute of Limitations. But there is the judgment, which does not appear to have been impeached; and although, having regard to the relation in which Howard and Gibbs stood to the Plaintiff Dudgeon and to Brown, and in which Alderson stood to Dudgeon and also to Brown, and the other Plaintiffs in the suit of Brown v. Howard, and having regard to the bond of the 1st of October 1830, I do not understand how it happened, that the Plaintiff's claim was passed over, or why the Plaintiff was not made a party to the suit, yet, as the judgment remains undisturbed, I think that I must give credit to it, so far as to admit the Plaintiffs, prima facie at least, to be entitled to some claim upon the estate. If the Defendants have an equitable case to make against the right of the Plaintiffs to the benefit of the judgment, I think that they ought to have adopted proceedings of their own to establish that case.

[374] In the present state of the proceedings, I do not think that there is any ground for dismissing the bill against the Earl of Rosebery.

I do not think that the receiver was or is a necessary party to the cause. If it had not been for the case of Lewis v. Lord Zouche (2 Simons, 388), I should not have thought him a proper party, and should have dismissed the bill against him with costs. But as he has been made a party, probably in consequence of the decision in that case, if his costs be provided for, it will possibly be more convenient for him to be permitted to remain on the record. Ultimately, his costs ought to be paid either by the Plaintiffs or out of the rents of the estate of which he is the receiver; and if the estate were not limited for the life of Mr. Primrose, provision for the receiver's costs need not now be made. As it is, the receiver's costs up to the hearing must now be paid by the Plaintiffs, without prejudice to any question by whom, or out of what fund, they ought ultimately to be paid.

I was asked to make an order to prevent the application of the rents under the orders made in the cause of Brown v. Howard. I do not think that the Plaintiffs have established a case entitling them to any such order. I give the Plaintiffs an opportunity of establishing, if they can, their legal right, but at present I do not think myself entitled to interfere in their favour any further. (NOTE.—An appeal to the Lord Chancellor is pending. [See note at beginning of case.])

[375] GRUBB v. PERRY. April 15, 1844.

After subpoena to rejoin, a Defendant cannot, without special leave, refer the bill for impertinence, though he has taken no step in the cause since its amendment. Plaintiff amended his bill requiring no further answer, and after the expiration of the eight days, filed a replication and served subpoena to rejoin. The Defendant afterwards took exceptions to the amended bill for impertinence. Held irregular. Whether the eight days mentioned in the 14th Order of 1833 are to be computed from the filing the amended bill or from amending the Defendant's office copy, quære?

This was an application to take off the file an exception for impertinence, which, it was alleged, had been irregularly filed by the Defendant.

On the 19th of March the Plaintiff obtained an order to amend his bill without costs, the Plaintiff amending the Defendant's office copy and not requiring any further answer.

On the 21st of March the Plaintiff gave notice to the Defendant that he had amended the bill, and requiring him to leave the office copy with the Record and Writ Clerk to be amended; and further that, at the expiration of eight days from that date, he would proceed to file a replication. The Defendant's office copy bill was left for amendment on the 22d, and on the 23d it was obtained amended.

By the 14th Order of December 1833 (Ord. Can. 47), where "the Plaintiff obtains an order to amend without requiring any further answer, and shall amend the bill, &c., the Defendant shall, as of course, have eight days' time to consider whether it is necessary for him or her to answer the same, at the end of which time the Plaintiff shall be at liberty to file a replication," &c., unless the Defendant shall obtain time to answer.

The Defendant neither answered the amended bill, nor obtained an order for time to answer it. The Plain-[376]-tiff, on the 30th of March, filed a replication, and on the 3d of April served a subpoena to rejoin. After this, the Defendant, on the 11th of April, filed an exception to the amended bill for impertinence.

Mr. Turner and Mr. Giffard now moved to take the exception off the file. A Plaintiff cannot refer an answer for impertinence after replication or an undertaking to speed the cause; Barnes v. Saxby (3 Swan. 232). The cause being at issue it is not competent for a party, at least without the special leave of the Court, to take a proceeding which may result in varying the issue between the parties.

Mr. Tinney, contra. The rule is, that a party may file exceptions for scandal at any time, and for impertinence at any time previous to his taking a step in the cause. Here the Defendant has taken no step whatever; all the subsequent proceedings have been taken by the Plaintiff.

Secondly, the Defendant is to "have eight days' time to consider whether" he will answer, at the end of which time the Plaintiff may file a replication. He is, therefore, to have eight clear days, and they must be computed from the time at which he obtains the office copy of the amendments, or, at all events, from the time when it has been amended according to the Plaintiff's undertaking. In either way, the eight clear days had not expired on the 30th of March, and therefore the replication was irregularly filed on that day.

[377] THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. Where a bill is amended, although the Plaintiff may require no answer, still the Defendant may be able, by answer, to state matters of defence of the greatest importance to him, and which cannot be given in evidence, unless the points be properly raised by his answer. For this reason, the Defendant is allowed eight days' time to consider whether it will be necessary for him to answer the amendments.

Then comes the question from what time the eight days are to be computed. The order is not very distinct; it does not say that the time is to be reckoned from the period at which the office copy is amended, but when the Plaintiff obtains the order and "shall amend," the Defendant is to have eight days. This seems to imply from the time when he "shall amend." Here the amendment was made on the 21st of March, and notice was given; therefore, between the amendment and the replication, there were eight clear days, even excluding both the 21st and the 30th.

I should be reluctant in laying down, that the time is to be computed from the time of filing the amended bill; but if you take it the other way, and compute the time from the amendment of the office copy of the bill, then, according to the ordinary rule of computing time, you must exclude the first and include the last day. This is the practice of the Court, it being considered that the fractions of the two extreme days are equivalent to one whole day; but when you speak of eight clear days, you mean eight clear days excluding the portions of both the first and last day. That is the established practice of the Court and in the registrar's office, though there is clear evidence of there being a different [378] practice in the Six Clerks' Office, (1) derived, perhaps, from considerations in favour of the liberty of the subject. However, reckoning in this manner, the replication was regularly filed, and the Defendant has had the time which the practice of the Court allowed him for answering.

The other question is, if the Defendant must determine within the eight days whether he will take exceptions for impertinence, and I think it must be so, for when the subpoena to rejoin has been served, new duties arise, the cause being at issue, the parties proceed to hearing on the record as it then is, and exceptions cannot afterwards be filed without leave. I am therefore of opinion that this application must be granted, and the exceptions must be taken off the file. The Defendant will not be without remedy, for if there be impertinence in the bill, he may get it expunged, but he must make a special application for that purpose. (2)

[379] AMES v. PARKINSON. June 5, 7, 1844.

Where a trustee neglects to invest on real or Government securities according to the trust, the cestui que trust has the right of selecting whether the trustee shall be answerable for the money or for the stock.

An executor and trustee directed to invest a legacy on mortgage, may properly appropriate one of the testator's mortgages in payment of the legacy, but he must ascertain its sufficiency.

A trustee having the option of investing on mortgage or Government security, improperly took an insufficient mortgage security. Being held answerable, the Court decided, that having exercised his discretion, though improperly, he was answerable for the money lost, and not for the stock it might have produced.

By his will, the testator directed his executors, "within twelve months after his decease, out of his personal estate, to lay out and invest in their or his names or name the sum of £1500 on mortgage of freehold or copyhold estates of inheritance or on Government securities," and which they were to hold upon certain trusts under which the Plaintiffs were interested.

The testator died on the 27th of December 1825, possessed of three mortgages on freehold estates for £800, £500, and £200, besides other property. His assets were admitted to have been more than sufficient to pay his debts, funeral expenses, and legacies, and it appeared that the Defendant, his executor, was interested in the residue.

On the 27th of December 1826 the executor appropriated the three mortgages of £500, £200, and £800 for the purpose of answering the legacy of £1500, which the executor had the option of investing on mortgage or Government securities.

The mortgage for £500 was paid off, and the produce properly invested.

The mortgage for £800 was paid off in May 1836, and was placed in the hands of Messrs. Gurney, bankers, to a deposit account, in the name of the surviving executor. The account was distinct from his own account, but the money was, in no way, marked as trust money.

The £200 was alleged and appeared to be invested upon an insufficient security, and the mortgagor was insolvent.

This bill was filed in 1842 by parties interested in the £1500 legacy, against the surviving executor, seeking to make him liable for the loss occasioned by the alleged non-investment of the legacy within twelve months after the testator's death.

The price of the funds had risen, so that it would be more beneficial to the Plaintiffs to make the Defendant account for the stock which might have been purchased, than for the money.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Busk, for the Plaintiffs. The executors never complied with the direction of the will. They might have invested the money on mortgage, yet it was to be "in their names;" but they had no authority to appropriate the testator's mortgage in discharge of the legacy, thus leaving the securities in the name of the testator, instead of that of the trustees.

As to the £200 mortgage, the executor did not exercise a proper discretion. The mortgage property is proved to be worth no more than £150, and the mortgagor is insolvent. The Defendant is interested in the residuary estate, and would have the benefit of appropriating bad securities to the payment of the legatee; he is therefore liable; Stickney v. Sewell (1 Myl. & Cr. 8).

[381] The Defendant committed a breach of trust by lending the £800 on a deposit account with his bankers, and as to all the funds, the cestui que trust has the option of recovering either the money or the stock, which would have been produced by a proper investment in the funds at the proper time; Watts v. Girdlestone (6 Beav. 188).

Mr. Turner and Mr. Adams, contra. The executor had a discretion, and has been guilty of no default in appropriating the testator's own mortgages in discharge of the legacy of £1500, for he has substantially fulfilled the directions of the testator. It would have been absurd for him to have realised the mortgages, and then to have reinvested the produce in the same securities to answer the legacy.

As to the two mortgages for £500 and £800, they have been realised, and no complaint can therefore be made as to those securities.

As to the £200 mortgage, there is no allegation that, at the time of the appropriation, the Defendant was aware that it was a deficient security, and it may have become depreciated since. If a trustee acts bona fide to the best of his judgment and without corrupt motives, the Court will not charge him, though the security he has taken may ultimately turn out deficient. There is no case, "in which an executor has been called upon to bear the loss that has arisen, because, in the bona fide exercise of a reasonable discretion, the conclusion he came to has turned out unfortunately;" Buxton v. Buxton (1 Myl. & Cr. 96). At all events, the Defendant is entitled to an enquiry on the subject.

[382] With regard to the deposit of the £800, the Plaintiffs have acquiesced, for it appears they witnessed the receipts for the interest signed by the tenant for life. The Defendant has not received any personal benefit from the investment, and there being a discretion either to invest on real security or in the funds, he is to be charged with the money only, and not with the stock. It was decided by Sir John Leach, in March v. Hunter (6 Mad. 295), "that if trustees may invest in stock or on real security, and they lend on personal security, and thereby the money is lost, they shall be answerable, not for the amount of stock which might have been purchased, but for the principal money lost." If real security had been taken, the principal money only would have been forthcoming to the trust, and the want of real security is all that is imputable to the trustees.

Lastly, the Defendant has been found a lunatic, and is shewn by the evidence to have had fits of partial insanity before the time from which he is found by the inquisition to have been a lunatic. He is not, therefore, responsible for his acts or defaults.

Mr. Kindersley, in reply.

Hall v. Hallet (1 Cox, 134), and Hockley v. Bantock (1 Russ. 141) were also cited.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. One ground of defence in this case is, that the Defendant has been found a lunatic by inquisition, which carries back the lunacy to December 1840, a period subsequent to the time when the several transactions, in [363] respect of which relief is sought, took place. These acts and omissions having taken place at a time not over-reached by the inquisition, the Defendant must be assumed, in the absence of distinct proof to the contrary, to have been of sound mind, and, having regard to the answer and evidence, I am of opinion, that there is no satisfactory proof of this gentleman having been of unsound mind at the several particular times at which the transactions complained of took place. He must, therefore, be considered subject to the same liabilities, as a person of competent understanding would be.

The principal allegation, on the part of the Plaintiffs, is, that the executors, being directed to invest this money either on real security in their own names, or on Government securities, have not done so: not having invested a competent portion of the testator's personal estate in their own names, it is asked that they may pay into Court so much stock as would have been purchased with the £1500, at the end of twelve months from the testator's death.

On the other hand, it has been argued, that there being proper mortgage securities belonging to the testator, the executors were under no obligation to sell or realise those securities; and afterwards invest the produce again in the same sort of securities. I think there is great weight in the argument; but it does not apply here. I do not think it was necessary for them to call in good securities, and then procure others of the same nature to answer the legacy, and I do not understand that there was anything to preclude the executors from appropriating proper securities belonging to the testator to the payment of these legacies; but the appropriation, being an act of their own, was done on their own [384] responsibility, and it was therefore incumbent on them to see that the securities so appropriated were of sufficient value. It was an exercise of discretion on the part of the executors when they, by appropriation, invested the £1500 on real security.

It has happened that, with respect to two of the three mortgages, they have been actually paid; in the exercise, therefore, of their discretion as to these two sums, they were right, and no harm ensued, because these two sums were both actually realised.

With respect to the other, I think there is, on this evidence, great doubt whether the discretion was properly exercised, because no enquiry appears to have been made by them at the time, and I am not satisfied that at that time it was a good security.

What is the extent of their liability? The executors exercised a discretion which they were authorised to do; and, taking it at the worst, it turns out that the £200 is not wholly secured. The loss must be answered by the trustee who has improperly exercised his discretion. The Plaintiffs ask, that they may have the benefit of the money, as if it had been laid out in the funds at the end of the year. I think they are not entitled to this, because the trustees had a right to exercise a discretion, whether the £1500 should be invested on real securities or in the funds. They exercised that right of selection; and are only to be charged with the sum which may be lost.

As to the £500 there has been no loss, and it was properly invested; therefore nothing more need be said respecting it.

[385] With respect to the £800, the case seems to be very different. When the mortgage was paid off in May 1836, the money was in the hands of the surviving trustee, who had a discretion to lay it out on mortgage, or on Government securities. He did neither, and never exercised his discretion, but left it on deposit at his bankers. It is said that after all this neglect, he, the trustee and executor, has a right to choose the investment in which he is to account for the trust fund, and that the cestui que trust has no such option. I will look at the authorities before I ultimately decide; but my impression certainly is, that the cestui que trust, and not the trustee, is the person entitled to select whether he will have the fund or the stock which the money would have produced at a reasonable time after it had been received.

June 7. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I have examined the authorities cited in argument in this case, but I have not found anything to cause me to alter the opinion which I have already expressed. Upon consideration, I retain the opinion I expressed in Watts v. Girdlestone, and think that case was rightly decided.

The trustees had a discretion to exercise. They might at their option have invested the money in the funds; and if the value had risen or fallen, they would have been safe, for they would have exercised their discretion according to the directions of the trust. But as to this sum of £800 they did not exercise the discretion at all, and the question is, whether the cestui que trust has not a right to complain of the omission, and to be placed in the situation in which he would have been, if the trustees had not neglected to exercise the discretion [386] reposed in them. I think that the opinion I have already expressed with regard to the £800 must be adhered to.

With regard to the £200, the trustee is entitled to an enquiry, but he is not liable for more than £200. The trustee exercised his discretion in an imprudent manner, and, as a punishment for his error, is answerable for the insufficient security, but as the discretion has been exercised, he is liable for the money only.

[386] STANLEY v. BOND. March 12, 1844.

[For subsequent proceedings, see 8 Beav. 50.]

Course of proceedings to take a bill pro confesso after appearance, under the 1st Order of April 1842.

Form of charging order, in equity, under the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 14.

In this case the Defendant had entered his appearance to the bill, but not having answered, an attachment issued against him.

The Plaintiff, being unable to procure the attachment to be executed by reason of the Defendant having gone abroad, gave notice of motion to take the bill pro confesso. The motion came on upon the 13th of July 1843, when it was ordered that the cause should be put in the paper on the 9th of July instant, and that the Clerk of Records and Writs should attend at the hearing of this cause with the record of the Plaintiff's bill, in order to have the same taken pro confesso against the Defendant.

On the next day, an order of course was obtained for setting down the cause next after the causes, &c., already [387] appointed, in order that the Plaintiff's bill might be taken pro confesso.

On the 19th of July 1843 a decree was made for taking the bill pro confesso against the Defendant; and it was ordered that the Defendant should pay to the Plaintiff his costs of the suit.

On the 18th of August 1843 the decree was left at the registrar's office, and duly marked by the proper officer. (2d Order of 10th May 1839, Ord. Can. 138.)

The costs were taxed at £299, 1s. 1d., as appeared by the Master's certificate, dated the 29th of January 1844, and the decree was duly registered in the proper office under the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110.

The Defendant, who was resident on the Continent to avoid payment, had standing in his name in the bank books a sum of £6106, 3½ per cent. Reduced.

The Plaintiff presented an ex parte petition praying that this stock might stand charged with the payment of the sum of £299, 1s. 1d.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Wright, in support of the petition. The only question was as to the form of the order to be made. It appeared that the form in the Common Law Courts was as follows: "I do order, unless cause be shewn to the contrary, that the sum of £ &c., do stand charged with the payment of the sum of £ , for which judgment has been recovered [388] against the said Defendant in Her Majesty's Court of at Westminster."

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale], ordered that the 3½ per cents. standing in the name of the Defendant should stand charged with the payment of the sum of £299, 1s. 1d. and interest, "unless the said Defendant should, on or before the 2d day of November next, shew unto the Court good cause to the contrary;" and it was ordered that the Governor and Company of the Bank of England be restrained from permitting a transfer of the said Bank annuities in the meantime, and until the order should be made absolute or discharged.

A testator charged annuities exclusively on his real estate, the legal estate of which he devised to trustees, upon trust to pay the rents to or permit the same to be received by one for life, with remainders over. On the testator's death, the tenant for life took possession of the estate and title-deeds, and he kept down the annuities, but cut some timber. The trustees acquiesced for four years, but afterwards proceeded by action to recover the deeds and to receive the rents. The Court, by motion, restrained the proceedings, on the tenant for life undertaking to keep down the annuities, not to grant leases or cut timber without the consent of the trustees, and bringing the deeds into Court.

Where a testator devises the legal estate to trustees, and gives to a tenant for life an equitable estate only, with remainders over, such tenant for life ought not to cut timber without the consent of the trustees.

The testator, by his will, bequeathed certain legacies, and also several annuities, which amounted in the whole to about £310 a year, and he charged his real estates with the payment of the annuities, and gave the annuitants powers of entry and distress for securing the same; and he bequeathed his residuary personal estate to William Morrice and Francis Denton, upon trust to pay his debts, funeral expenses, and legacies (except the annuities) and pay the residue to the Plaintiff.

[389] And he devised his real estates "unto and to the use of William Morrice and Francis Denton and their heirs and assigns, upon trust to pay the rents, issues, and profits of the same unto, or permit the same to be received, held, and enjoyed by Thomas Denton (the Plaintiff) and his assigns for and during his natural life, and from and after his decease, then the said testator gave, devised, directed, limited, and appointed the said real estate and premises last above-mentioned, unto all and every the child and children of the Plaintiff, on his, her, or their attaining their respective ages of twenty-one years" with certain gifts over.

The testator died in July 1840, and on his death Thomas Denton, the tenant for life, entered into possession of the estates, and of the title-deeds. This was done with the assent of Morrice, but whether or not with the assent of Francis Denton was a matter in contest upon the affidavits used on the present occasion.

The personal estate was more than sufficient to pay the charges thereon, and part of the surplus had been handed over to the Plaintiff. The annuities were not at any time in arrear.

In September 1842 Morrice died, and in November following Atkinson was, under powers contained in the will, appointed a new trustee in the place of Morrice.

After this time, disputes took place between the tenant for life and the trustees, as to the right to the possession of the estates and of the title-deeds; the trustees, on their part, insisting, that they were entitled to the possession of both. They required that the deeds should be delivered up to them, that the rents should be received by the Plaintiff as their agent, and that the [390] receipts should be given in their names. This claim not having been acquiesced in by the Plaintiff, the trustees, in March 1844, commenced an action of detinue against the Plaintiff to recover the title-deeds, and gave notice to the tenants to pay the rents to them.

Thomas Denton, thereupon, filed this bill, praying the performance of the trusts of the testator's will; that it might be declared that the Plaintiff, so long as he kept down the annuities, was entitled to receive the rents of the estate and hold the title-deeds, or, if the Court should think fit, that they should be brought into Court. The bill also prayed an injunction, to restrain the trustees from proceeding in the action of detinue and from distraining, &c., on the tenants, or compelling them to pay the rents to the trustees, and from disturbing the Plaintiff's possession.

A motion was now made for the injunction.

One ground on which the motion was resisted was, that the Plaintiff, of his own authority, had cut down and sold a number of trees upon the estate, and had rendered no account thereof to the trustees. On this point, there were many affidavits filed as to the propriety of cutting the timber. It appeared that part of the timber had been cut on another neighbouring estate, the sole property of the Plaintiff.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. James Parker, in support of the motion, contended, that as the trustees had no active duties to perform, the cestui que trust, according to the ordinary rule, was entitled to the possession of the estate; that as the annuities had been regularly kept down, there was no necessity for the interference of the trustees, on behalf of the annuitants, who had a [391] legal remedy for recovering their annuities by means of their power of entry and distress, in case they should be in arrear.

As to the timber, they contended, that it appeared from the affidavits that it had been cut down in the proper and provident management of the estate, and that the produce had been principally applied in repairing upon the estate. They further argued, that as the Defendants had acquiesced in the existing mode of dealing with the estate and with the title-deeds down to the present time, they had no right unnecessarily to vary it.

Mr. Turner and Mr. Malins, contra. The testator has thought fit to give to the trustees the legal estate, and has entrusted them with the performance of duties in respect to it; they are to see that the annuities are regularly paid, and also that the estate is properly managed and protected, not for the sake of the Plaintiff, but for those entitled in remainder. They ought, therefore, substantially, to have the possession on behalf of the various persons interested in the estate.

As trustees and legal owners of the estate, they are entitled to the possession of the title-deeds on behalf of all parties; and it would be an act of great negligence and a breach of duty for trustees to leave them in the hands of the tenant for life; Erews v. Bicknell (6 Ves. 173).

The Plaintiff has no right to cut timber without the sanction and concurrence of the trustees. He is not to be the judge of what, as between himself and those in [392] remainder, is proper to be cut; and he ought to have kept a proper account of the produce.

Jenkins v. Milford (1 Jac. & W. 629) and Doe dem. Lloyd v. Passingham (6 Barn. & Cr. 305), as to the legal estate, were cited.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale], without hearing a reply. This is a case which happily very rarely arises between trustee and cestui que trust. There is no question as to any breach of trust, but the sole contest is for power, and arises from a personal feeling, the gratification of which, I confess, I am unable to appreciate the value of.

I have not now to determine either the nature or extent of the estate vested in the trustees, because I will assume that they have the legal estate to any extent they may require for the purpose of the present motion. I have no doubt whatever that the testator devised the estate to the trustees for the protection of the estate; and if it now appeared that the trustees were desirous of exercising the power which the legal estate gives them, for the purpose of protecting the estate from any injury which it was likely to suffer, I certainly should in no way interfere. But how does the case stand? Notwithstanding all the observations I have heard, I must take it that Mr. Denton, the trustee, has acquiesced in the possession of this estate by the equitable tenant for life. What does it signify that now and then he made his complaints, or that he could not get his co-trustee to concur with him in asserting the right he now insists on. If any interference on the part of the trustees was necessary for the protection of the estate, this Court was at all times open to [393] him. He, however, never applied, but acquiesced in the possession of this estate by the equitable tenant for life, who has regularly paid the annuities: in that respect, at least, there has been no default on the part of the tenant for life. The Plaintiff has therefore been in possession from the death of the testator down to the present time: he has kept down the annuities; and he has done this with the acquiescence of the trustees. As I understand the case, all this has been done in accordance with the will, which directed the trustees either to pay the rents to, or permit the same to be received by the tenant for life. The trustees now desire to have the rents received in their own names, and to have possession of the title-deeds.

In the course of this proceeding, I believe there has been some error on both sides. The Plaintiff, Mr. Denton, has desired and assumed to be, and to seem to the world to be, somewhat more independent of the trustees than the testator intended. In that respect, I think he has acted under considerable error.

The trustees now desire to have this matter put on a different footing; but what has happened? There is no arrear of the annuities, but it is said that there has been a cutting down of timber. Now certainly, in my opinion, the Plaintiff has no right to cut down timber without the consent of the trustees; and I think also that he committed considerable error when he cut down his own timber and timber belonging to the estate, and mixed up the whole into one transaction. If he cut down timber on the settled estate for the performance of the duties attached to him as tenant for life, it was his duty to have preserved a distinct account and distinct evidence of the timber he so cut down, and of its application, because he was bound to account for it to the trustees.

[394] The trustees, therefore, now desire that the system which has gone on from the testator's death to the present time may be discontinued, not because the tenant for life has done anything wrong, for nothing had before been said about the timber, but because something wrong may be done. That, I think, is a subject which may hereafter be properly examined into; but what I am to consider upon this interlocutory application is, whether the state of circumstances existing from the testator's death to the present time ought not to be continued up to the hearing of the cause, preserving matters as they were; and I think there is no reason at all why this state of things should, at present, be altered.

At the same time, I am desirous of not saying anything which may tend to diminish the legal power the trustees may have. I say nothing about their estate; they may be entitled to the whole extent they now contend for; and it may be extremely necessary for the purpose of protecting the estate, that they should interfere. What I have now to consider is, whether they have done right in interfering with the existing state of things, and in endeavouring to take away from the Plaintiff, before his rights have been finally determined, that which the trustee has heretofore acquiesced in his having.

Before I interfere, I must have a very distinct undertaking from the Plaintiff, to keep down the annuities—not to cut any timber without the consent of the trustees—not to grant any lease beyond leases from year to year, without the consent of the trustees. The Plaintiff giving these undertakings, and bringing the deeds into Court, and leave being given to the Defendants to apply if any of them should be infringed, I shall restrain the Defendants from proceeding with the action, and from interfering with the Plaintiff in the receipt of the rents.

[395] ROWLEY v. ADAMS. March 1, 2, 4, 5, 6, 7, 9, May 9, 1844.

[Affirmed, 2 H. L. C. 725; 9 E. R. 1267. For other proceedings, see 4 My. & Cr. 534; 41 E. R. 206; 7 Beav. 548; 9 Beav. 348; 14 Beav. 130.]

Special directions given in a decree for an account, that if the Master should be unable to take such account, by reason of the non-production of the books of account or other circumstances, he should ascertain and state such circumstances, and report thereon.

Difficulty in making a decree against parties depending on the result of accounts, which could not be satisfactorily taken, in consequence of the loss of the books of account.

Executors, having, for about three years, paid interest on the Plaintiff's legacies, the Court, at the first hearing, directed accounts, with a view of determining, from the state of the assets, the liability of the executors to pay the legacies. The Court, on further directions, refused to hold, that by payment of interest the executors had admitted assets, such a conclusion being wholly at variance with all that had been previously done in the suit.

In 1825 the testator and his son Henry E., who had previously carried on business as brewers, admitted another son, George, into partnership. By the partnership deed, it was agreed, that the plant, &c., which it was stated had been valued at £63,600, exclusive of the stock and debts, should be the capital, of which the testator was to be entitled to a moiety. The testator's surplus monies in the business were represented to amount to £48,915, on which the testator was to receive interest. The testator died in 1826, having, by his will, given his surplus capital to his executors, in trust to invest on security, and pay the income to his wife, and after her death to set apart two legacies of £12,000 each for his daughters and their children; and he gave his interest in the business, and the stipulated ordinary capital, to his sons Henry E., George, and William, who was a minor, and he directed and required his executors to carry on the business, in conjunction with his sons, until the youngest attained twenty-one, and he empowered them to sell the brewery during William's minority. He charged his freehold and other property with the payment of his surplus capital, and directed mortgages of his real estate for securing the legacies. The will was not proved till December 1827; but, after the testator's death the executors left the surviving partners in the undisturbed possession of the partnership property, and though they did not take any active part, the business was carried on with their concurrence. Disputes arose between the surviving partners, and a suit for administration was instituted, which, through the interference of the executors, was abandoned. In January 1828 the executors joined in deeds whereby the partnership was dissolved, and Henry E. assigned his interest to George in consideration of £20,000, and the executors released Henry E. from all claims in respect of any surplus capital. The business was afterwards sold with the sanction of the Court, and in March 1830 was found to be insolvent, and the partnership property turned out to be wholly unproductive to the testator's estate. In January 1831 a bill was filed by infants interested in the two legacies, seeking to charge the executors with wilful default in not having obtained payment of the legacies out of the surplus capital. By several decretal orders, accounts were directed to be taken as to the accuracy of the recitals in the partnership deed, the value of the plant, &c., and the surplus money due to the testator at his death, and accounts of the partnership dealings and transactions; and if he should find that he was unable to take such account, by reason of the non-production of books of account, he was to state the circumstances. He was also directed to inquire by whom the partnership property was possessed at the death of the testator, and how disposed of, and whether the executors, with due diligence and without their wilful default, might have possessed themselves, out of the partnership property, of sufficient to pay the two legacies of £12,000. The Master was unable to take the accounts, by reason of the non-production of the books. He found, however, on the imperfect evidence before him, large sums due to the testator, and large partnership assets, which however varied in each of his three reports: he also found that the executors might, with due diligence, &c., have possessed themselves, out of the partnership property, of sufficient to pay the two legacies. The Court, however, was of opinion, that there was no reason for thinking that the testator's surplus capital could, if at all, have been realized without putting an end to the business, which the executors were not bound to do. That though the executors had not fully or properly performed their duty, still it was more a matter of conjecture than of proof what the assets and liabilities were, that the results were not accurate or approaching to accuracy, and that it had not been satisfactorily made out either that there were partnership assets, out of which the legacies could have been recovered or secured, nor that the assets were such as to make it impracticable for the executors to obtain payment of the legacies. The Court, in this state of things, declined to charge the executors.

This cause came before the Court upon exceptions to the Master's report. The facts are fully detailed in the judgment of the Master of the Rolls.

Sir William Follett, in reply.

May 9. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. By a decretal order made in these causes on the 9th of May 1839, it was, amongst other things, referred [397] back to the Master to enquire and state to the Court, by whom the property and effects of the partnership in the causes mentioned, existing at the death of the testator Henry Wyatt, were possessed and received, and how and by whom the same had been applied and disposed of, and what had become thereof. And the Master was to enquire, whether the executors, with due diligence and without their wilful default, might have possessed themselves, out of the partnership property and for the testator's estate, of a sufficient sum to pay and satisfy the two legacies of £12,000 each, found to be due to the Plaintiffs, or any and what part thereof: and in making the enquiries, the Master was to have regard to the findings in his several reports of the 29th of April 1835, the 12th of June 1837, and the 1st of May 1838.

The Master, by his report, dated the 16th of December 1843, finds, that the partnership business was carried on after the testator's death by Henry Earley Wyatt and George Wyatt with the concurrence of the executors; but he does not find that the executors or either of them interfered with or gave any orders or directions with respect to the management thereof, or to the collection of the assets thereof. And, on consideration of the states of facts and evidence before him, he finds, that on the decease of the testator there were sufficient assets of the partnership, existing at the death of the testator Henry Wyatt, for the payment of the two legacies of £12,000 each, and he found, that the Defendants the executors, with due diligence and without their wilful default, might have possessed themselves, out of the partnership property for the testator's estate, of a sufficient sum to pay and satisfy the legacies found due to the Plaintiffs, or that they might, with due diligence and without their wilful default, have secured, out of such [398] property and for the testator's estate, a sum sufficient for the payment of the legacies.

To this report the Defendants, the executors, have filed twenty exceptions, of which the three first are admitted to be the most material.

In these exceptions it is alleged, first, that the Master ought not to have certified, that on the decease of the testator Henry Wyatt there were sufficient assets of the partnership existing for the payment of the legacies of £12,000 and £12,000. Secondly, that he ought not to have certified, that the executors, with due diligence and without their wilful default, might have possessed themselves, out of the partnership property and for the testator's estate, of a sufficient sum to pay and satisfy the legacies, or might, with due diligence and without their wilful default, have secured, out of such property and for the testator's estate, a sum sufficient for payment of the said legacies. Thirdly, that he ought to have certified, that the executors could not, with due diligence and without their wilful default, have possessed themselves, out of the partnership property and for the testator's estate, of a sum sufficient to pay and satisfy the legacies.

Henry Wyatt, the testator, had carried on business as a brewer on his own account. He had three sons—Henry Earley, George, and William; and, having agreed to take Henry Earley into partnership for a fourth share, he executed a deed, dated the 9th of April 1817, and made between himself of the one part, and Henry Earley Wyatt of the other part. It was therein recited, that the father had proposed and agreed to take the son into partnership for the term of twenty-one years, and to give him (subject to a proviso after contained), a fourth [399] part or share of the plant, stock-in-trade, and effects of the business, except the stock of malt, ale, and beer, and the debts owing to the father up to the 1st of January then last; and further, that the said one-fourth share had been estimated at the sum of £6000 as the fourth part of £24,000, the balance due to the father from the trade, upon which sum, it was agreed, that the son should, out of his share of profit, allow to the father interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum. In the operative part of the deed, it was provided that Henry Wyatt, the father, might, at any time during the continuance of the partnership, sell and dispose of his share in the partnership stock-in-trade and effects and goodwill, to any person or persons, who should thereupon be taken and received as a partner in the trade, upon such terms as might be mutually agreed upon between the father and son. And it was agreed, that any sum lent to the concern by either party, or any share of profits left in the concern by either party with the consent of the other, should bear interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum.

On the 1st of January 1825 George Wyatt, the second son, was admitted a partner with Henry Wyatt, the father, and Henry Earley Wyatt, the eldest son. The deed to carry into effect the agreement then made, is dated the 31st of December 1825, and it was made between Henry Wyatt of the first part, Henry Earley Wyatt of the second part, and George Wyatt of the third part. The partnership between Henry Wyatt and Henry Earley Wyatt was dissolved, and it was agreed, that Henry Wyatt, Henry Earley Wyatt, and George Wyatt, should become and be partners from the 1st of January 1825, for seven years, if all of them, or if Henry Wyatt and either of the others should so long live.

[400] The second article, which has given rise to much controversy in this case, was to the following effect:—That the plant, utensils, implements, horses, drays, waggons, carts, live and dead stock, and other effects now belonging to and employed in the business which have been valued at the sum of £63,626, 4s. 1d. (exclusive of the stock of malt, ale, and beer, and the debts due and owing to the late partnership up to the 31st of December last inclusive, and which are meant to continue the property of Henry Wyatt and Henry Earley Wyatt as part of the effects of their late partnership, and exclusive also of the principal sum of £48,915, 5s. 10d. the amount of surplus money due and owing from the business and belonging to Henry Wyatt; and also the further principal sum of £3129, 16s. 10d. the amount of surplus money due and owing from the business, and belonging to Henry Earley Wyatt, which shall be employed by and in the said intended partnership), and the capital of the said partnership shall consist of the said sum of £63,626, 4s. 1d., and the said several sums of £48,915, 5s. 10d. and £3129, 16s. 10d. shall form a surplus capital of the said Henry Wyatt and Henry Earley Wyatt, on which they shall respectively receive interest. Henry Wyatt was to be entitled to one equal moiety of the £63,626, 4s. 1d., and Henry Earley Wyatt to an equal fourth part thereof; and the annual profits of the business were to be applied in paying to Henry Wyatt and Henry Earley Wyatt interest, at 5 per cent., upon the several sums of £48,915, 5s. 10d. and £3129, 16s. 10d. respectively, and the clear residue thereof was to be paid as to one half to Henry Wyatt, and Henry Earley Wyatt and George Wyatt were each of them to have one-fourth, but, out of the one-fourth of George, Henry Wyatt was to have interest at 3 per cent. upon £15,909, 1s. being the fourth part of the capital of £63,626, 4s. 1d.

[401] No one of those who have had to consider this deed, seems to have been able to understand what the parties really meant by the recital which it contains, and the intention which they might have had is, at this time, involved in as much obscurity as ever. It must be supposed that, on the 31st of December 1825, there was considerable property belonging to the firm of Henry Wyatt & Son, and several debts owing to and from the firm. In computing the capital to be employed in the new firm, certain portions of the property were excluded; amongst other portions, the debts owing to the old concern; nothing is said as to the mode of paying the debts owing by the old concern; but assuming that the property of the old firm which was excluded from the computation of the capital to be employed in the new firm was sufficient for the purpose, and was intended to be applied in payment of the debts of the old firm, it is stated, that £63,626, 4s. 1d. was to be the capital employed in the new firm, and that the two sums owing to the old partners, and amounting together to upwards of £52,000, were to form a surplus capital.

It would seem, that the whole of the tangible property with which the business was to be carried on, and by which all charges were to be borne, had been estimated, or perhaps arbitrarily stated, at £63,626 and that this was the only property out of which the £52,045 was to be paid to the old partners, and yet interest at 5 per cent. upon the £52,045 was made payable out of the profits of the new firm, and George Wyatt was, besides, to pay interest at 3 per cent. on £15,919 as a fourth part of the £63,626, stated to be the value of the capital to be employed in the new concern, just as if no debt had been charged upon it.

[402] The business was, however, carried on, as the parties may have supposed, under the provisions of this deed.

Henry Wyatt made his will, dated the 14th of June 1826, and he thereby bequeathed to the Defendants Adams and Marks all such surplus pecuniary capital and then accrued interest thereon, as, at his decease, he should have in his business, over and above his rightful and stipulated capital therein, and also such shares as he should be entitled to in Government, East India or South Sea stock, in trust to invest the same surplus capital in Government or real securities, and to stand possessed of the surplus capital, stocks and funds, on trust, during the life of his wife, to pay the income to her, and, after her death, on trust, out of the same surplus capital stocks and funds, to appropriate and set apart the two several legacies of £12,000, each afterwards given for the benefit of his two daughters and their children; and he gave the residue to his two sons George and William. And he gave a copyhold estate to his wife for life, with remainder to his son George, and a freehold estate to his wife for life, with remainder to his son William. And then he gave, devised and bequeathed all his share and interest of and in the brewhouse, and of and in the plant, stock-in-trade, and all chattels used in carrying on the business, and of and in the goodwill of the said business, and the stipulated ordinary capital for carrying on the said business (charged and chargeable as in the said will mentioned), as to one moiety of his moiety, being one-fourth of the whole, unto and for the use of his son William; and as to the other moiety of his moiety, being the remaining one-fourth of the whole, unto and equally between his sons George and William. And he directed and required his executrix and executors to concur in carrying and managing his said business, in conjunction with his sons for the time being of full age, on behalf [403] of William, he being under the age of twenty-one years; and for their trouble they were to have £50 a year out of William's share, and thereout an allowance was to be made for William's maintenance, and the residue of the annual gains was to be invested for his benefit. The testator then gave the residue of his personal estate, subject to his debts and funeral and testamentary expenses, and the deficiency of legacies and otherwise as before mentioned, to his executrix and executors to be invested, and the income to be paid to his wife for life, and, after her decease, in trust for his sons George and William and his daughters. The testator then gave the two legacies of £12,000 each to Adams and Marks, in trust for the benefit of his daughters and their children, with such remainders over as in the will stated. He then empowered the guardians of his son William, during his minority, if they should think fit, to sell William's share in the brewery, and all benefit thereof, unto his brothers, or any other person. He then gave certain property to his son Henry Earley, and for the benefit of his son William, making the same subject to his just debts, funeral and testamentary expenses and legacies. And he declared that all the freehold and other property whatsoever, devised, given and bequeathed by his will, was so devised, given and bequeathed, subject to and charged and chargeable with the payment of the surplus capital continued or lent in the business, and the interest for the same. And he charged all his copyhold and customary estates devised by his will, and also his residuary estate, with the payment of the two several sums of £12,000 to his daughters, and directed that interest, after the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, should be paid thereon till invested, from and after the decease of his wife; and he directed that his sons and all necessary parties should, whenever thereunto required (and which he directed might be [404] done), duly execute good and sufficient mortgages to his trustees, of the same copyhold or customary and freehold estates for securing payment of the same sums of £12,000 each, with interest for the same sums respectively after the rate aforesaid, and expenses, within two years after the date of his decease, in which mortgages were to be contained powers of sale; and should also enter into and execute any other deed, for more effectually charging and making liable such estates, and also the testator's residuary estates, with the payment of the two sums of £12,000 and interest and expenses. And he appointed his wife, or, after her decease or second marriage, Samuel Adams and Edmund Marks, guardian or guardians of his son William Wyatt. And he appointed his wife and Adams and Marks executors of his will.

The testator died on the 9th of July 1826, and the executors were willing to prove the will and to act in execution of the trust thereof.

By the testator's death, the partnership, so far as it depended on the deed of the 31st of December 1825, ceased; but the testator directed and required his executors to concur in carrying on the business in conjunction with his sons Henry Earley and George. By the recital, in the deed of the 31st of December 1825, the testator and his sons had represented, that the capital employed in the concern, exclusive of the stock of ale, &c., and also exclusive of the debts owing to the concern, exceeded £63,000, and that he had surplus capital to the amount of £48,000.

It has been considered that, by the expression "surplus capital," which is used in the deed of December 1825, the parties did not mean monies or surplus capital beyond what was employed in the business, but did mean the amount of debts due from the partnership to the individual partners, and payable out of the partnership assets, which were, in the first instance, subject to the debts due from the partnership; and, even on the assumption that a large debt was due to the testator's estate from the partnership, and that the partnership property, after payment of the debts due from the partnership to other persons, was sufficient to pay what was due to the testator, I find nothing in the proceedings which affords any reason for thinking, that the sum of money or debt which the testator called his surplus capital, could, if at all, have been raised or realised, without putting an end to the trade and selling off the property employed in it.

But having regard to the circumstances in which the executors were placed at the time of the testator's death, considering the nature of his will, and the recitals in the deed, the executors appear to me to have had some reason to think otherwise. The testator would seem to have intended, not only that the "surplus capital," as he called it, should be taken out of the concern, but also that the trade should be carried on, for he gave the surplus capital with other property to the trustees, on trust to be invested in Government or real securities, and directed that the interest arising therefrom should be paid to his wife, and that the principal money, after her death, was to be the primary fund for payment of the two legacies of £12,000; and he also, by the same will, directed and required his executors to concur with his sons of full age, in carrying on the business till his son William attained the age of twenty-one years.

It would seem, however, that the testator had some doubt or misgiving, not only as to the sufficiency of the [406] surplus capital to pay the legacies, but also as to the practicability of realising the "surplus capital" out of the partnership assets. He did not intend his daughters to rely on that fund alone for payment of the legacies, for, although the legacies amounted to £24,000, and the "surplus capital," as it was called, had, on the 31st of December 1825, been stated to be £48,000, and is supposed to have been afterwards increased, nevertheless, after making the surplus capital the primary fund for payment of the legacies, the testator charged his other property with the payment thereof, and directed security to be given; and he also thought fit to subject and charge his freehold and other property with the payment of the "surplus capital" continued or lent in the business.

After the investigation which the subject has undergone, it is very difficult, if not impossible, to form any clear notion of that which the testator intended to be done; and on this part of the case I cannot conclude that the executors, even if they had possessed the power, would have been to blame, or would have become liable to answer, personally, for any loss which ensued, merely because they did not proceed at once to realise, by sale of the partnership property, such debt as was due to the testator from the partnership at the time of his death. I do not think that they could have done so, without putting a stop to the trade, which they were expressly directed and required to carry on; and I think that the directions to invest the testator's "surplus capital" are materially qualified, not only by the directions to carry on the trade, but also by the direction to secure the legacies in another manner, and by the "surplus capital" being itself charged on the testator's other property.

[407] It appeared, upon the death of the testator, that there was a very valuable and important business in which a large capital was employed, and which the executors were directed to concur in carrying on with the testator's adult sons, until his minor son came of age, with the intention, no doubt, that after that time, his three sons should carry on the business in partnership together; and also with the intention, that the debt due to himself, which he called "surplus capital," should be paid, and should be the primary fund for paying the legacies to his daughters, for which, however, he provided other security.

Under these circumstances, the executors seem to have thought, that the assets would be sufficient to pay everything thereout payable; and they seem only to have desired that the business might be carried on as the testator intended. Why were they to distrust Henry Earley and George, the surviving partners of the testator, with whom the testator himself had directed them to concur in carrying on the trade? Why were they to think, that in doing the very thing which the testator had directed them to do, they were exposing his assets to hazard? How could they suppose, that in following his directions, they were committing a breach of trust, and exposing themselves to liability. But a short time after the testator's death, serious disputes arose between Henry Earley Wyatt and his brother George, the surviving partners; and Henry Earley Wyatt, the elder brother, denying the validity of his father's will, and, in November 1826, causing a caveat to be entered against the proof of it. The authority of the trustees being thus questioned, it was impossible for them to act as if they had obtained probate.

[408] It was argued, that they ought to have known, and must have known, that Henry Earley Wyatt had no case against the will. I think it appears that they never had any serious doubt of the will being ultimately established; but Henry Earley Wyatt, in his answer to the bill filed by the executors in 1829, which was long after the caveat was withdrawn and the probate granted, did not admit the validity of the will; and the executors, being for a long time unable to obtain probate, the limited power, which the will would have given them, to interfere with the property and rights of the surviving partners, was very much diminished. The disputes between the brothers Henry Earley and George proceeded to great length. It appears, from a letter written by Mr. Coote to Henry Earley in January 1827, that the executors took the part of George, and accused Henry Earley of considerable misconduct. Whether the accusation was well founded, or what defence was made, does not appear; but it is plain, that with such disputes between the partners, the business which they were to carry on could not prosper, and with the knowledge which has now been obtained, it cannot be doubted, that Mr. Orchard and Mr. Rowley adopted a very prudent course for their wives and families, when, on the 5th of March 1827, they filed a bill in this Court to have the trusts of the will duly executed, and to procure the appointment of a receiver of the partnership property and the other personal estate of the testator, and to have the accounts taken.

In this bill it was stated, that after the testator's death, the trade was carried on by Henry Earley Wyatt and George Wyatt or one of them; that great differences and animosities existed between them; that they had no communication with each other on the affairs of [409] the trade, and that no proper accounts were kept, and misconduct was charged against Henry Earley Wyatt.

It is to be regretted, and by none so much as by the executors, that this bill was not prosecuted; but the executors, and more especially Mr. Marks, appear to have been persuaded that the assets were amply sufficient for payment of the legacies, and that the trade might be carried on advantageously, if Henry Earley Wyatt could be prevailed upon to leave it, and if the business were not interfered with by a receiver. Under these circumstances, Mr. Coote, who acted as solicitor for George and also for the executors, whilst he was taking the necessary steps to obtain probate of Henry Wyatt's will, was also taking steps to induce Henry Earley Wyatt to sell his interest in the concern to George, and also to induce the Plaintiffs in Orchard v. Wyatt to dismiss their bill. These several objects were dependent on one another; Orchard and Rowley would not dismiss their bill till probate of the will was granted to the executors, and Henry Earley Wyatt would not agree to withdraw his caveat, till George had agreed to purchase his share in the concern; and many difficulties arose in settling the terms of the purchase. After very carefully reading all the correspondence, and all the evidence relating to the treaty and negotiation, I see no reason to think, that the executors and Mr. Coote on their behalf did not act with perfect bona fides, and with the intention of carrying into effect the testator's intention, so far as they could after the disputes arose between Henry Earley and George. It may have been, and I think it was, very imprudent to assist or concur in the purchase by George of Henry Earley Wyatt's share on such terms as were adopted, and very imprudent to use any endeavours to procure the dismissal of the bill in Orchard v. Wyatt; but there is nothing to [410] shew, that the executors did not adopt the course which they sincerely believed to be beneficial to the estate of the testator. It seems manifest, that Orchard and Rowley must, ultimately, have been of the same opinion; and I do not think that the executors are liable to any blame for not prosecuting their suit for probate with greater activity than they did. No unnecessary delay appears to have taken place, until such progress had been made towards completion of the purchase, that further adverse proceedings would only have occasioned needless expense.

Nevertheless, it does not appear to me that the executors fully or properly performed their duty. Some investigation of the property and accounts had taken place, and the result of it was, apparently, such as to satisfy the executors, that the statement of the capital of the partnership, recited in the deed of the 31st of December 1825, was altogether erroneous; that the plant, stock and effects of the partnership, exclusive of beer and malt and of debts due, amounted to no such sum as £63,000; and that the something, which was called the testator's "surplus capital," amounted to no such sum as £48,000. Finding and acknowledging such errors, I think that the executors ought to have taken peculiar care to have the state of the property and affairs of the partnership accurately ascertained, and ought not to have sanctioned the sale of Henry Earley Wyatt's share to George, and to have done the other things provided by the deeds of January 1828, without first ascertaining the real value of the capital, and the accurate state of the concern at the time of the testator's death, and at the time of the intended assignment. They were under great difficulties; it seems probable that the state of the concern was better known to Henry Earley Wyatt than it was, or could be, to any other person, and that he was not very willing to give information. It may have [411] been, that, notwithstanding every proper exertion, they would not have been able to obtain all the information which they ought to have had; but in my opinion, if they had not the information which the occasion required, they ought to have refused to sanction the arrangement between Henry Earley and George. It was strongly pressed against the executors, in argument, that they improperly relied on such information as Henry Earley Wyatt thought proper to afford them at a meeting held on the 8th of June 1827, and proceeding upon that, entered into an arrangement which the true state of the assets did not warrant, and thereby occasioned great loss to the estate. The whole extent of the reliance which the executors placed on Henry Earley Wyatt, or how or when he satisfied them that he was to be relied on, does not appear; but they admit, that, from the representations made to them by Henry Earley Wyatt as to the state of the assets of the partnership, they were induced to believe, that, on the 1st of January 1828, the testator had not any "surplus capital" in the trade, or any sum of money due to him therefrom on his separate account, and that there were not any assets of the partnership remaining, except his share and interest in the partnership trade, and a mortgage debt of £800 due from Cooper.

The testator's widow died on the 15th of April 1827.

Probate of the will having been obtained on the 24th of December 1827, the executors joined in the execution of deeds of the 1st of January 1828, whereby the partnership was dissolved as to Henry Earley Wyatt, and by which Henry Earley Wyatt assigned his share and interest in the concern to George Wyatt, in consideration of £5000 said to be then paid, and the further sum of £15,000 agreed to be paid by future half-yearly pay-[412]ments of £500 each, and the executors, professing to do it as far as they lawfully could, released Henry Earley Wyatt from all claim they might have against him, in respect of any "surplus capital," and also from any claim they might have against him as creditors of the partnership.

After the date of these deeds, the business was carried on by George Wyatt alone. On the 6th of May 1827 William, the younger brother, came of age. He declined to become a partner in the business, and on the 15th of July in the same year, a new bill was filed by Rowley and Orchard, and their wives and children, to have the estate protected, and the trusts of the will executed. In that suit, it was alleged, that the executors had proved the will, but that, in consequence of various disputes and differences, they had not acted in the trusts or in execution of the will of Henry Wyatt. A receiver was appointed, and George Wyatt having, with the approbation of the executors, contracted to sell the property to Mrs. Thomson, a reference was made (Nov. 1829) to the Master to inquire into the propriety of that arrangement; and ultimately (in March 1830) it appeared that the concern was insolvent, the debts owing by the concern amounting to £64,600 and upwards, whilst the assets did not amount to £57,400; and thus, the partnership property turned out to be wholly unproductive to the testator's estate. George Wyatt and Thomson, not long afterwards, became bankrupt (in Dec. 1831), and Henry Earley Wyatt obtained payment of part only of the £15,000 stipulated to be paid to him.

The present bill was filed, by the infants interested in the two legacies of £12,000, on the 3d of January [413] 1831; and the allegation on their behalf, which I have now to consider is, that the executors, without their wilful default, might have obtained payment of the legacies of £12,000 out of the partnership property.

For the purpose of proving, that the executors might, without their wilful default, have obtained payment of the two legacies of £12,000 it should be established:—

First. That there were assets applicable to the payment of the legacies, which the executors might have received.

Secondly. That such assets were lost, through the wilful neglect or default of the executors.

In this case, therefore, the first question is, whether the testator had in the partnership concern, in the shape of "surplus capital" or otherwise, an interest convertible into money sufficient for the payment of these legacies.

Sir John Leach, by his decree dated the 28th of April 1832, directed an inquiry as to the accuracy of the recitals in the deed of the 31st of December 1825; and an inquiry, what, at the time of the death of Henry Wyatt, was the value of the plant, utensils, implements, horses, drays, waggons, and other effects, not excluding malt, ale, beer, and debts; and also what was, at that time, the amount of surplus money due and owing from the business, and belonging to the testator.

Sir John Leach thought fit to direct the inquiry as to the accuracy of the statement in the partnership deed, although his own mind appears to have been satisfied on the subject, for he said, that no person looking at [414] the case could fail to see, that the sums named in the deed were nominal and fictitious sums.

The Master made his report on the 29th day of April 1835; he states that various books, which, by the evidence before him, appear to have been kept and used in the partnership business, had not been produced before him,—viz., the cash-book, the bankers' pass-book, the cheque-book, two books bound in calf, in which were entered the annual accounts of the partnership for the year preceding the 1st of January 1825, and two other books, containing an account of what each partner had drawn out. And he finds, that, in consequence of the non-production of the books, he is unable to state what, on the 1st of January 1825, was the value of the plant and other articles, which in the deed of the 31st of December 1825 was stated to amount to the sum of £63,626, 4s. 1d. But he found that, on the 1st of January 1825, there was due from the partnership to Henry Wyatt £48,915, 5s. 10d., and to Henry Earley Wyatt £3129, 16s. 10d., which sums were considered as surplus capital; but that they did not consist of monies or surplus capital over and above what was employed in the trade. That £13,000, part of £52,045, 2s. 8d. the aggregate of the two sums owing to the partners, represented improvements made to the stock since the 1st of January 1817, and the residue, about £39,000, represented the property of the partnership of Wyatt & Son, exclusively of the plant and other things, and except the improvements, but in the absence of the books in which the accounts were entered, and of the other books before referred to, and save as in his report set forth, the Master was unable to state the particulars of the sum of £13,000, or, except as in his report mentioned, how the several sums of £48,915, 5s. 10d. and £3129, 16s. were made up, or what was the amount of surplus money due [415] and owing from the business to the said Henry Wyatt and Henry Earley Wyatt on the 1st of January 1825. The Master further finds what was the value of the plant and other things at the time of the testator's death. No evidence had been laid before him as to the quantity or value of the malt, hops, and corn on the premises at that time; but he finds the value of several other particulars, amounting in the whole to £70,208, subject to a debt of £8000 owing to the bankers; and that there was owing to Henry Wyatt from the concern a sum of £57,329, 9s. 8d.; and that the property liable to pay the same was, in the first instance, subject to the debts owing from the partnership, but that, from the non-production of the books, he was unable to state, save as aforesaid, what was the amount of surplus money at that time due and owing from the business and belonging to Henry Wyatt.

Considering that the testator's assets were to be determined at the time of his death, and that the state of the partnership at a prior time could only be material as affording a period and a state of accounts from which a subsequent account could be taken, the directions contained in the decree were imperfect; and upon the report, made on such imperfect evidence, in answer to the inquiries directed by Sir John Leach, no further directions could be given, and the case coming on before Lord Cottenham, when Master of the Rolls, on the 11th of January 1836, he directed an account to be taken of the partnership dealings and transactions, regard being had to the findings stated in the Master's report of the 29th of April 1835; and if he should find that he was unable to take such account, by reason of the non-production of books of account or other circumstances, he was to ascertain and state such circumstances and to make a separate [416] report thereof (see Turner v. Corney, 5 Beavan, 515); and thereupon the parties were to be at liberty to apply to the Court for such further order as should be necessary, and the usual accounts were directed to be taken of the testator's personal estate, debts, and legacies, and the Master was to inquire as to the real estate.

In his judgment, on making this order, Lord Cottenham noticed, that the Plaintiffs were claiming their legacies out of a specified part of the testator's estate, and could not be in a better situation than a legatee of such specific part would be, and that no specific legatee could recover the thing bequeathed, without proving the existence of the thing bequeathed, and that it was not wanted to satisfy prior charges.

The Master made a separate report, dated the 12th of June 1837, and thereby found, from such evidence as was before him, that hops belonging to the brewery business at the testator's death were, according to one estimate, of the value of £7993, 15s., and, according to another estimate, of the value of £4893, 15s., and that, besides the book debts owing to the bankers, the partnership was indebted to other persons to the amount of £17,463 (1); and he expressed his opinion to be, that, by reason of the non-production of the books of account therein mentioned and the circumstances therein contained, he could not take the account of the partnership dealings and transactions by the order directed to be taken, further than before mentioned, and that he had no means whatever of taking any account as between the individual partners in the business.

[417] Exceptions were taken to the separate report, and the Master made his general report on the 1st of May 1838, and the cause came before me on the exceptions and for further directions. The exceptions were overruled, and on the 9th of May 1839 it was referred back to the Master to make the inquiries which I have before particularly mentioned. (Ante, p. 396.)

This order was reheard before the Lord Chancellor, who confirmed it (4 Myl. & Cr. 534), and, in pursuance thereof, the Master made his report of the 16th of December 1843, which is now under consideration.

The general result of the Master's report is, that at the time of the testator's death the partnership assets were of the value of £89,961; that the debts owing from the firm to strangers amounted to £39,748, leaving a surplus of somewhat more than £50,000; that the firm was indebted to the testator in more than £57,000; and the Master has concluded, that the executors might, without their wilful default, have obtained out of the assets, and for the testator's estate, a sufficient sum to pay the two legacies of £12,000 each, or might have obtained security for them.

It is obvious that the Master, although he has used the utmost diligence, has not been able to obtain results satisfactorily shewing the state of the assets and liabilities of the firm. Having used his best endeavours to obtain accurate results, he states, in his different reports, that save as he has done, he is unable, in consequence of the non-appearance of the books relating to the partnership, to state the property and effects of the partnership existing at the testator's death, or by whom they [418] were received or applied, or what parts thereof were outstanding. After all the trouble which has been taken, and all the expense incurred, it is, at this time, more a matter of conjecture than of proof what the assets and liabilities were.

The accounts of the dealings and transactions of the partnership have not been, and cannot be, accurately taken. No account has been taken between the individual partners. It does not appear what would probably have been produced by a sale of the plant and stock, on breaking up the business shortly after the testator's death.

The value of the malt, though stated in a report which has been confirmed, does not rest on proof which can be called satisfactory. The value of the hops, as stated in this report, is not satisfactorily proved; and the amount of debts, in the first report stated to be £8000 and upwards, in the second report stated to be £25,463, and in the present report stated to be £39,748, cannot be considered as accurately ascertained. It may possibly be, that an accurate statement of the accounts and liabilities would not so alter the present apparent state of the assets as to shew, that after payment of the debts, there would not have been a surplus belonging to the partners of such amount, that the testator's share of it would have been sufficient to pay these two legacies; but this is not and cannot be proved, because no complete and accurate account can be taken. The assets, as stated by the Master, comprise debts due to the testator and his partner Henry Earley Wyatt, and debts due to the testator and his two sons as partners. What was due and payable to the testator from either of the partners does not appear. Some portions of the several debts have not been received; and it does not appear, whether, by any exertion, the unreceived debts could have been collected; neither does it appear, whether all the debts which were in fact received could have been collected, if the business had been suddenly put an end to; and we do not know what was the true amount of the demands upon the concern.

To what extent the results obtained by the Master are erroneous, in consequence of the imperfect and unsatisfactory evidence before him, it is impossible to say, but

(1) He also found that the stock of malt on the premises at the death of the testator was worth £13,015, 16s.

I cannot affirm, or even think it probable, that the results are accurate, or approaching to accuracy. With results, which, as it seems to me, must be to some, and even a very considerable extent, erroneous, and without having any means of obtaining results which can be relied on as accurate, or of shewing the extent of the errors occasioned by the non-production of books and accounts, can I say that the executors are answerable as if the results were ascertained to be accurate?

Every successive investigation has resulted in an apparent increase of assets, but also in an apparent decrease of surplus applicable to the payment of the debts due to the partners. None of the results are or can be considered as accurate, but such as they are (and the Master could not do better, nor are better results likely to be ever attained), in round numbers, the first report (ante, 413) shewed assets £70,000, ascertained debts £8000 and upwards, leaving a surplus of about £62,000. The second report (ante, 417) shewed assets £83,000, ascertained debts £25,000, leaving a surplus of £58,000; and the last report shews assets £89,000, ascertained debts £39,000, leaving a surplus of £50,000; the principal items, in all the reports, resting on most imperfect evidence. Is it possible to treat this last result as if it were accurate, to charge the executors personally, as if it were proved to [420] be so? Such a proceeding would, as it appears to me, be inflicting an arbitrary penalty upon the executors, instead of charging them with ascertained assets, which, without a breach of trust, they might have received.

I am, as I have before stated, far from stating that the executors fully performed their duty; they were, I think, greatly mistaken in using endeavours, which unfortunately succeeded, to stop the suit which was commenced, for the security of the legatees; greatly mistaken in dealing with the property without having an accurate account of it taken, and greatly mistaken in executing a release to Henry Earley Wyatt, in the manner they did; but, in a case where it is not proved by any satisfactory evidence that the most active diligence could have obtained payment of these legacies out of the partnership property, I feel an insuperable difficulty in saying, that the executors might, without their wilful default, have received them. The Master, indeed, has not found absolutely, that the Defendants might have possessed themselves, out of the partnership property and for the testator's estate, of a sufficient sum to pay the legacies, but he proceeds, in continuation of the same sentence, as follows: "or they might, with due diligence and without their wilful default, have secured, out of such property and for the testator's estate, a sum sufficient for the payment of the said legacies." Considering that a caveat had been entered against the probate of the will, and that the surviving partners had a legal right to possess themselves of the partnership assets, and to collect the debts, it is obvious, that the executors, who could not prove the will till a subsequent time, could only have secured the partnership assets, and the payment of the legacies out of the testator's interest in them, by filing a bill in a Court of Equity, or by availing themselves of the bill already filed by the legatees. [421] I think that the executors (who were trustees of the legacies) might, by a bill of their own, have obtained the appointment of a receiver. Acting in concurrence with the legatees, a receiver might have been appointed in their suit, and it would have been much better if such a course had been adopted; but were the circumstances, as they were then known, such as to make it the imperative duty of the executors to adopt it?

Considering the statement which the partners had made of their capital in their partnership deed, there seemed to be sufficient reason to believe that the concern was prosperous, and might pay what was due from it to the testator. If this were an error, as it probably was, it was occasioned by the testator himself; but there seemed to be nothing but the conduct imputed, truly or erroneously, to Henry Earley Wyatt, to prevent the future prosperity of the trade, which the testator had expressly directed them to carry on, and it was clear, that the appointment of a receiver, if it did not put an end to the trade altogether, would very greatly injure it. The executors, by filing a bill or concurring in the appointment of a receiver, would, at once, have relieved themselves from all further responsibility; but, in the circumstances in which they were placed, I cannot say that their abstaining from filing a bill was such a wilful neglect as would make them personally answerable for something which might have been recovered by the suit, and which, in the absence of the suit, was lost; and how is it possible to ascertain what might have been recovered in the suit? Who can venture to affirm that by the suit, if duly prosecuted, £24,000 might have been recovered for the testator's estate out of this concern, of which so little is accurately known?

[422] The executors were traders dealing with the concern, and were creditors of it, and it was argued, that they had a strong personal interest in the business being carried on. They might have had, perhaps had, some interest of that kind; but they did not interfere in the conduct of the trade, and there is really nothing to shew that any such personal interest influenced their conduct. The mere existence, or probable existence, of such an interest naturally excites suspicion; but in Courts of Justice suspicion must not be permitted to usurp the place of evidence and established truth.

And it was argued at the Bar, that the executors having paid, or consented to the payment of interest on the legacies (NOTE.—Down to the 18th of April 1829), ought to be held to have admitted assets for payment of the legacies; but such a conclusion would be wholly at variance with all that has been done in these causes. If the Court had considered that, under the circumstances of this case, the executors were to be held to have admitted assets to pay the legacies, all the investigations which have been made would (so far as the legacies are concerned) have been wholly unnecessary. And having regard to all the other circumstances which I have stated, I am unable to conclude that the executors could, without their wilful default, have secured, out of the partnership property for the testator's estate, a sufficient sum to pay the legacies.

Being of this opinion, I must allow the two first exceptions; but the evidence is not such as to enable me to allow the third. It does not appear to me to be satisfactorily made out, that there were partnership assets out of which the legacies could have been recovered or secured; on the other hand, it is not satisfactorily made [423] out, that the assets were such as to make it impracticable for the executors to obtain payment of the legacies. I cannot affirm either one or the other—either the proposition in the report that the executors might have obtained the legacies, or the proposition in the third exception, that they could not.

The parties have, I think, on both sides properly considered that the other exceptions are not very material to be considered; but I have examined them, and I am of opinion that, except the fourth, they must all of them be overruled. I do not at present consider whether any hope can be entertained of obtaining further information upon further inquiry, or whether any of the parties may or may not be entitled to any further inquiry, if they desire it. Those questions may be considered on further directions; but I am of opinion that the evidence, as it stands, is not sufficient to support the finding as to the hops, which are the subject of the fourth exception; and, attending to the inquiries upon which the Master proceeded, to the directions given, and to the evidence obtained, I am of opinion that the Master was perfectly right, in the regard which he had to his former findings. He was well aware of the imperfect nature of the evidence on which those findings rested; and he has admitted evidence to prove them to be erroneous, and has either corrected them, or retained them, as upon the evidence appeared to him to be proper; and in this respect I think that he proceeded correctly, and has come to right conclusions. On this ground, I overrule all the exceptions from the 5th to the 12th, both of them included.

Upon the evidence, I am of opinion, that the executors did leave the surviving partners in the undisturbed possession of the partnership property, and that they [424] did so far consent to and encourage the business being carried on by the surviving partners, that although they did not take any active part in carrying on the trade, it may be properly said, the business was carried on by the surviving partners with their concurrence; and for these reasons, and because there was no direction to ascertain the state of the assets on the 1st of January 1825, I am of opinion that the thirteenth, fourteenth, fifteenth, and nineteenth exceptions must be disallowed.

The findings of the Master upon subjects of the sixteenth, seventeenth, and eighteenth exceptions, appear to me to be in accordance with the evidence; and the exceptions must, for that reason, be overruled. I think that Mr. Coote was acting for the executors as well as for George Wyatt during the negotiation.

The twentieth exception relates to the real estate, and was not argued.⁽¹⁾

[S. C. 13 L. J. Ch. 410. See Ockleston v. Heap, 1847, 1 De G. & Sm. 642; Osborne v. Rowlett, 1880, 13 Ch. D. 786; In re Morton and Hallett, 1880, 15 Ch. D. 146.]

A testator devised real and personal estate, on certain trusts, which, as the Court considered, the testator intended to be performed by his trustees named, and the survivors and survivor, and by the heirs and assigns, or by the executors or administrators, of the survivor. The will contained no power to appoint new trustees. The surviving trustee devised and bequeathed the trust estates and powers to A., B., and C., upon the trusts of the first will. Held, that this devise and the appointment of A., B., and C. as trustees, were valid.

Where a trust estate is limited to several trustees, and the survivors and survivor of them, and the heirs of the survivor of them, the surviving trustee does not commit a breach of trust by not permitting the trust estate to descend, or by devising it to proper persons, on the trusts to which it was subject in the hands of the surviving trustee. Semble.

The question in this cause related to the validity, in equity, of a devise made by a surviving trustee of the trust estates, having regard to the particular expressions used in the will creating the trust, and to the fact, that no express power of appointing new trustees was thereby given. The circumstances which gave rise to the question are as follows:—

Richard Titley, the testator, by his will dated in 1828, devised and bequeathed his real and personal estate to his wife, his son Richard, and Robert Tebbutt, [426] “their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns,” upon the trusts, &c., after mentioned. He then declared the trusts, which, on eleven several occasions, he expressed as being to be performed by “the said trustees, and the survivors and survivor of them, his or her heirs and assigns.” The same persons were empowered to sell the residuary real estate, and to give receipts for the purchase-money, and “the said trustees and executors, and the survivors and survivor of them,” were to get in the personal estate.

The “said trustees and the executors, and the survivor and survivors of them, his or her executors and administrators,” were to apply the proceeds of the sale of the real estate directed to be sold, and of his personal estate, in payment of specified legacies to his children, and were to invest the residue in realty, and apply the rents as therein mentioned, and in the meantime to invest in the funds, &c.

He declared, that “if it should appear to his said trustees, or the survivors or survivor of them, his or her heirs or assigns, that it would be advantageous” to sell his estate at Gorton, or the estates to be purchased “by the said trustees,” by virtue of the powers thereinbefore given them, it should be lawful “for the said trustees, or the survivors or survivor” of them, to do so.

There was a power of leasing to “his said trustees for the time being,” and an indemnity clause to his “trustees and executors;” and the testator declared, that “the said trustees and executors, and each of them, their and each of their heirs, executors, administrators and assigns,” might reimburse themselves their costs, &c., &c.; and he appointed his wife, Henry [427] Burgess, Robert Tebbutt, and his son Richard executors.

The will contained no power to appoint new trustees.

(1) This exception was subsequently argued, and the further directions and costs disposed of; see post [7 Beav. 549]. An appeal to the House of Lords is however pending.

By the deaths of the other parties, Robert Tebbutt became the sole surviving executor and trustee.

Robert Tebbutt, by his will dated in 1838, after disposing of his own real and personal estate, devised and bequeathed to Edward Titley, David Waddington, and Charles Wolstenholme, their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, all the trust estates, monies, and premises vested in him as surviving devisee in trust and executor of the will of Richard Titley, upon the trusts, &c., &c., expressed in the will of Richard Titley; and he appointed Wolstenholme, Crompton, Unwin, and Ollier, executors.

This bill was filed by the cestuis que trust under the will of the original testator, praying a declaration that Robert Tebbutt was not authorized to appoint trustees, and that the devise and bequest of the trust estates by his will was invalid and ineffectual, and for the appointment of new trustees, and conveyance to them of the trust premises.

Mr. Bacon, for the Plaintiffs. The will of Titley gives no authority to the trustees to nominate new trustees; the devise of the trust estate is therefore invalid, and new trustees should be appointed under the authority of the Court. This case is governed by the decision in Cooke v. Crawford (13 Simons, 91), in which case a testator devised his real estates to A, B, and C, in trust [428] that they, or the survivors or survivor of them, or the heirs of the survivor, should, as soon as conveniently might be after his decease, but at their discretion, sell the same; and he empowered them and their heirs to make contracts with and conveyances to the purchasers: and declared that the receipts of them, or the survivors or survivor of them, or the heirs, executors, or administrators of such survivor, should be good discharges to the purchasers: and he directed that they, their heirs, administrators, and assigns should hold the proceeds of the sale upon certain trusts. A and B disclaimed, and C alone acted. He devised the estates to M. and N. upon the trusts affecting the same. After his death, M. and N. agreed to sell the estates to P.: it was held by Sir L. Shadwell that M. and N. were not entitled to execute the trust for sale, as they were the devisees, and not the heirs, of C.

The Vice-Chancellor of England, in giving judgment in that case, said, "It is plain that, when William Hall, who, by the disclaimer of Burkitt and Woolley, became the sole trustee, thought fit to devise the legal estate that was vested in him, he did an act which he was not authorized to do. And here I must enter my protest against the proposition, which was stated in the course of the argument, that it is a beneficial thing for a trustee to devise an estate which is vested in him in that character. My opinion is, that it is not beneficial to the testator's estate that he should be allowed to dispose of it to whomsoever he may think proper; nor is it lawful for him to make any disposition of it. He ought to permit it to descend; for, in so doing, he acts in accordance with the devise made to him. If he devises the estate, I am inclined to think that the Court, if it were urged so to do, would order the costs of getting the legal estate out of the devisee, to be [429] borne by the assets of the trustee. I see no substantial distinction between a conveyance by act inter vivos, and a devise; for the latter is nothing but a post mortem conveyance; and, if the one is unlawful, the other must be unlawful."

In Townsend v. Wilson (1 Barn & Ald. 608, and 3 Mad. 261) it was held, that a power of sale given to three trustees, was not well executed by the two surviving trustees; and in Bradford v. Belfield (2 Simons, 264), it was determined that a trust for sale vested in A. and his heirs, could not be executed by an assign of A.

The testator having abstained from giving to his trustee any power of selecting his successors, it was as much a breach of trust to devise the trust estate, as it would have been to have transferred it in his lifetime.

He referred to 2 Jarman on Wills, p. 714.

Mr. Turner and Mr. Little, for the Defendants. This case does not come within the decision of Cooke v. Crawford. Here the devise and bequest is to the trustees, their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, and the trusts are to be performed by the assigns. In Cooke v. Crawford the Vice-Chancellor of England observed on the omission of the word assigns. He says, "It is observable that the testator has not used the word 'assigns,' either in the clause in which he has created the trust for sale, or in either of the two clauses that follow it, in which he points out the machinery by which the sale is to be effected. He does not introduce that word until he begins to speak of something that is to be done after the sale has taken place, that is, until he [430] declares the trusts upon which the proceeds of the sale are to be held."

A trustee who has undertaken a trust cannot, without authority, relieve himself from his duty, and refer its performance to another person, for delegatus non potest delegare. The rule, however, ceases upon the death of the trustee, when there is an end to all personal confidence, for a testator cannot be supposed to entertain any personal confidence in the heir, executor, or administrator of a trustee; they must be unknown to the testator, as it depends on the chance of events who may fill those characters.

If it be a breach of trust to devise a trust estate, it would be equally one for a trustee to make a general devise without excepting thereout the trust estates. The testator, by the use of the words "executors" and assigns, must have intended his trustee to have some power of nomination; and it would be no more improper to make a devisee than to appoint an executor. The interests of the cestui que trust might require such a devise; for the heir might be an infant or lunatic, or under disability, or an alien. To prevent the estate falling into improper hands or escheating to the Queen, who would not be bound by the trusts, it surely would not be wrong to devise the trust estate to trustworthy persons, by whom the trusts might be carried into execution.

A "devisee" may come within the term "heir," as he is considered the hæres factus, besides which a devisee is an "assignee" in law; Whitfield v. How (2 Shower, 59).

Lord Eldon did not concur in the decision in Townsend v. Wilson as appears in Hall v. Dewes (Jacob, 189), and Bradford v. Belfield (2 Simons, 264) does not apply.

[431] Lastly. Conveyancers have always considered, that in these cases a trustee might properly devise a trust estate. The result of holding the contrary will be not only to destroy many titles, but to make the estates of the trustees, who have heretofore devised trust estates, liable at this moment for a breach of trust. The Court has always regard to the established practice of conveyancers, and considering the prejudicial consequences, will not feel inclined to extend the doctrine of Cooke v. Crawford.

They also referred to Lord Braybrooke v. Inskip (8 Ves. 417), Wall v. Bright (1 Jac. & W. 494, 1 Sug. on Powers (6th ed.), 223), The Midland Counties Railway Company v. Westcomb (11 Sim. 57).

Mr. Bacon, in reply. The testator has pointed out the heir as the person who is to perform the trusts after the death of the trustee, and the latter had no authority to vary that arrangement.

If difficulties arise in cases of lunacy, &c., a proper remedy will be applied; but these difficulties are not to extend the powers of a trustee, and enable him to exercise a discretion which the author of the trust has not given him.

July 8. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. Robert Tebbutt was surviving trustee and executor under the will of Richard Titley. By his will, dated the 30th of July 1838, Robert Tebbutt gave, devised, and bequeathed unto the use of Edward Titley, David Waddington, and Charles Wolstenholme, their heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, all the trust estates, monies, [432] and premises vested in him as surviving devisee in trust and executor, named and appointed in and by the last will of Richard Titley, to hold the same, to the use of the said Edward Titley, David Waddington, and Charles Wolstenholme, their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, according to the nature and quality of the same premises respectively, upon the same trusts, and to and for the same ends, intents, and purposes, and under and subject to the same powers, provisos, and declarations as are limited, expressed, declared, and contained of and concerning the said estates, monies, and premises, in and by the said will of the said Richard Titley, or as near thereto as circumstances would admit.

The question in this cause is, whether the devisees in trust, under the will of Robert Tebbutt have, by virtue of the devise, lawfully become trustees of the estates devised by the will of Richard Titley. It is admitted that the legal estates and interests which were vested in Robert Tebbutt, as surviving trustee and executor, have, by virtue of his will, become vested in his devisees and legatees; that they, as such devisees and legatees, are under an obligation so to dispose of such legal estates and interests, that the cestui que trust under the will of Richard Titley may have the benefit of them; but it is alleged, that they have not, themselves, any legal authority to execute the trusts, and consequently, that new trustees ought to be appointed for the purpose by this Court.

Richard Titley, the testator, by his will dated the 16th of January 1828, gave, devised, and bequeathed to his wife, his son Richard, and Robert Tebbutt, their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, all his real estate and all his personal estate; to hold the same real and personal estate, to the use of his wife, his son [433] Richard, and Robert Tebbutt, their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, according to the nature thereof, to, for, and upon the several uses, trusts, ends, intents, and purposes in his will after mentioned and declared. And then he proceeds to particularise the trusts, directing a part of the trusts which was to be performed by application of the personal estate, to be performed by the trustees, and the survivors and survivor of them, his or her executors or administrators, and directing other parts of the trusts which were to be performed by application of rents or by conveyance or sale of real estates, to be performed by the trustees, and the survivors or survivor of them, his or her heirs and assigns. There are, in the will, a few directions given, in respect of which neither the word "executors" nor the word "assigns" is distinctly used; as where he says "my said trustees or any of them," "my said trustees," "my trustees and executors," "my trustees and executors, and the survivors and survivor of them," "or my trustees for the time being;" but this case is very distinguishable from the case of Down v. Worrall (1 Myl. & K. 561), where, although the gift was to the trustees, their executors, administrators, and assigns, there was a mere personal direction given to the trustees: and, having regard to the whole will, I consider it to be clear, that on all occasions to which I have referred, the expressions used had reference to the class of persons to whom he had given the real and personal estate on the trusts of his will, and whom he has, in the course of his will, repeatedly designated and described as the persons by whom the trusts were to be performed; and (upon a careful examination of the will), I am of opinion, that the testator intended that the trusts of his will should be performed by the trustees named, and the survivors [434] and survivor, and by the heirs and assigns, or by the executors or administrators of the survivor, and that he has used words sufficient to give validity and effect to that intention.

The testator has not, by his will, given any power to appoint new trustees, and it is thereupon argued justly, that the trustees, or the survivors or survivor of them, could not, by any assignment or act inter vivos, relieve themselves from the responsibilities and duties of the trust; but it is further contended, that the same disability attends any assignment by way of devise or bequest, and that although the estate and property may be vested in the devisees or legatees of the surviving trustee, the duties and the responsibilities attending the execution of the trusts remain in the legal representatives, real and personal, of the surviving trustee.

Upon this occasion, there is no question as to the trustworthiness of the devisees, or as to any fraudulent or improper motive of the surviving trustee in making the devise and bequest. The argument, in this case, has been, properly, conducted on the supposition that the devise was, or at least may have been, made to trustworthy persons, for the purpose of better executing the trusts. No imputation has been cast upon the conduct of the surviving trustee, or upon the conduct, character, or trustworthiness of his devisees and legatees; and the case is, therefore, to be considered independently of any circumstance involving any such imputation.

When a trust estate is limited to several trustees, and the survivors and survivor of them, and the heirs of the survivor of them, and no power of appointing new trustees is given, we observe a personal confidence [435] given, or at least probably given, to every one of the several trustees. As any one may be the survivor, the whole power will eventually come to that one, and he is entrusted with it, and being so, he is not, without a special power, to assign it to any other; he cannot, of his own authority, during his own life, relieve himself from the duties and responsibilities which he has undertaken.

But we cannot assume, that the author of the trust placed any personal confidence in the heir of the survivor; it cannot be known, beforehand, which one of the several trustees may be the survivor; and as to the contingent survivor, it cannot be known, beforehand, whether he may have an heir or not, or whether the heir may be one, or may consist of many persons, trustworthy or not, married women, infants, or bankrupts, within or without the jurisdiction. The reasons, therefore, which forbid the surviving trustee from making an assignment inter vivos, in such a case, do not seem to apply to an assignment by devise or bequest; which, being made to take effect only after the death of the last surviving trustee, and consequently after the expiration of all personal confidence may, perhaps not improperly, be considered as made without any violation or breach of trust. It is to take effect, only at a time when there must be a substitution or change of trustees: there must be a devolution or transmission of the estate, to some one or more persons not immediately or directly trusted by the author of the trust: the estate subject to the trusts must pass either to the hæres natus or the hæres factus of the surviving trustee, and if the heir or heirs at law, whatever may be their situation, condition, or number, must be the substituted trustee or trustees, the greatest inconvenience may arise, and there are no means of obviating them, other than by application to this Court. With great respect [436] for those who think otherwise, and quite aware that some inconveniences, which can only be obviated in this Court, may arise, from devising trust estates to improper persons, for improper purposes, I cannot, at present, see my way to the conclusion, that in the case contemplated, the surviving trustee commits a breach of trust by not permitting the trust estate to descend, or by devising it to proper persons, on the trusts to which it was subject in the hands of the surviving trustee.

But the case so considered is not the present case. We have, in this will, expressions which clearly shew that the testator intended the trusts to be performed by the "assigns" of the surviving trustee; and in construing the will, we must, if practicable, ascribe a rational and legal effect to every word which it contains. We cannot, consistently with the rules of this Court, consider the word "assigns" as meaning the persons who may be made such by the spontaneous act of the surviving trustee to take effect during his life; but there seems nothing to prevent our considering it as meaning the persons who may be made such by devise and bequest; and if we do not consider the word "assigns" as meaning such persons, it would, in this will, have no meaning or effect whatever.

For these reasons, and under the circumstances of this case, I am of opinion, that the devise and bequest made by Robert Tebbutt of the trust estates held by him under the will of Richard Titley, was a good and valid devise and bequest; and that the estates thereby given to Edward Titley, David Waddington, and Charles Wolstenholme are vested in them, on such of the trusts thereof declared by the will of Richard Titley, as now remain to be performed.

[437] RIDGWAY v. WOODHOUSE. March 18, April 2, 1844.

A testator directed his charitable bequests to be paid out of his pure personalty, in priority of all other charges; and he devised his real and personal estate to trustees, upon trust, to lay out the personal estate in real estate, and pay the rents, &c., to his wife for life; and he directed, that in case his wife's sister should reside with, or dwell in the house or place of residence of his said wife, or become part of her family, then, for every day of such residence, &c., his trustees should retain £100 out of the rents, &c., payable to his wife, and pay the same to a charity. Held, first, that the condition was not illegal; secondly, that its effect being to divest a vested interest, it must be strictly construed; and, thirdly, that as the benefit intended for the charity could not, in consequence of the Statute of Mortmain, take effect, the condition was void.

Joseph Ridgway, by his will dated the 13th February 1841, directed the charitable bequests given by him to be paid out of such part of his personal estate not specifically bequeathed as might be legally bequeathed or charged by will for charitable purposes, in preference to his debts, testamentary and funeral expences, and legacies, and all other charges whatsoever, and he exempted such part of his estate as might be legally given, bequeathed, or charged for charitable purposes from payment of or contribution to his debts, and such other charges, and he imposed the same upon the remainder of his estate, real and personal, so far as might be necessary; and he directed his assets to be duly marshalled for that purpose.

The testator also gave to his sister Alice Harrison the clear yearly sum of £400.

But he provided, that in case Thomas Harrison, son of his said sister, should, at any time after his decease and notice to his said sister of this condition, reside with his said sister, or dwell in her house or place of residence, or become part of her family, the bequest thereinbefore contained for her benefit should cease and become void, as if she were actually dead.

The testator then gave several legacies and charitable bequests, and devised all his freehold, copyhold, and real [438] estate, unto John Woodhouse and John Mangnall, their heirs and assigns, upon trust, in the first place, for payment of his debts, legacies and testamentary and funeral expences, in aid of his personal estate; and subject thereto, he gave the real estates to the use of the said John Woodhouse and John Mangnall, their heirs and assigns, during the life of his wife Anna Maria Ridgway or until she should marry again, upon trust to receive the rents and pay thereout the repairs, &c., and then to pay the remainder unto his wife, A. M. Ridgway, and her assigns during her life, if she so long remained his widow, for her own use and benefit; which provision was to be in satisfaction of dower, and also to be considered as inclusive of all claim for jointure under her marriage settlement, so long as she remained unmarried, and not in addition thereto.

In case of his wife's marriage, that provision was to cease, and his wife was to have £400 a year jointure provided by settlement, and after the death or marriage again of his said wife, he devised the same freehold, copyhold, and real estate, to the use of his said trustees, and their heirs during the life of his nephew Joseph, upon trusts for his benefit, and after his decease, to the use of his first and other sons in tail with divers remainders over, under which, Thomas Stewart Kennedy was the first tenant in tail.

The testator bequeathed his leasehold estates upon similar trusts.

The testator, upon the decease or marriage again of his said wife, gave other charitable legacies, among which was £1000 to the Bolton Dispensary.

And the testator gave his residuary personal estate to his trustees, upon trust, to invest it in real estates, to be settled to the same uses as his own real estates; and [439] until such purchases were made, the sums applicable thereto were to be laid out, and invested in the names of the trustees, on real or Government securities, and to be varied at discretion. The dividends, interest, and annual produce thereof were to be paid and applied unto such person or persons and in such manner, as would have been the case respecting the rents, issues, and profits of the premises to be purchased therewith, if such purchase had been then actually made.

The testator appointed John Woodhouse and John Mangnall executors of his will.

On the 22d November 1841 the testator made a codicil, whereby, after noticing the provision made for his wife, he declared, that in case Elizabeth Editha Wittenhall, sister of his said wife, should, during her lifetime and widowhood, reside with or dwell in the house or place of residence of his said wife, or become part of her family, then and in every and any such case, and for each and for every day which the said E. E. Wittenhall should reside with or dwell in the house or place of residence of his said wife, or become part of her family, he directed his said trustees and executors to retain, from and out of the rents, interest, dividends and other monies payable or to be paid to his said wife under or by virtue of his said will, or the trusts thereof, the sum of £100, and when so retained to pay the same to the treasurer for the time being of the Bolton Dispensary, to be by him applied in aid of the funds of that institution.

By another codicil, dated the 23d of June 1842, the testator appointed his wife to be an executrix of his will so long as she lived and continued his widow.

The testator died on the 26th of December 1842, and the will was proved by the executors and executrix on [440] the 14th of January 1843 in the Consistory Court of the Bishop of Chester.

This bill was filed by the testator's widow against the executors, Joseph Ridgway, the first subsequent tenant for life, and Kennedy, the first tenant in tail; stating, that Joseph Ridgway disputed the validity of the will and codicils of the testator, that the Plaintiff was still the testator's widow, and that E. E. Wittenhall had not, since the death of the testator, resided with or dwelt in the house or place of residence of the Plaintiff, or become part of her family.

It also submitted whether the condition in the first codicil was not void, and prayed the establishment of the will and the performance of the trusts.

By the answers it was admitted that the Plaintiff was the widow of the testator; but it was stated that Elizabeth Editha Wittenhall had, since the death of the testator, resided with or dwelt in the house or place of residence of the Plaintiff, and become part of her family. That no application had been made by the treasurer of the Bolton Dispensary, or any person on his behalf, though the fact of such residence was known to him.

Mr. Kindersley, Mr. Turner, and Mr. Chandless, for the Plaintiff. The Court does not favour conditions tending to create forfeiture, especially when the effect is to defeat a vested gift, and such conditions will be strictly construed. The original vested gift must prevail if the condition annexed by the codicil cannot take effect. (See Carver v. Bowels, 2 R. & Myl. p. 307; Kampe v. Jones, 2 Keen, 756; Ring v. Hardwick, 2 Beavan, 352; Campbell v. Brownrigg, 1 Phil. 301; Green v. Harvey, 1 Hare, p. 431.) Here the condition is objectionable on several grounds. First, it is an illegal condition which [441] the Court will not enforce, for the direction that the testator's wife's sister should not reside with her, or become a member of her family, arose from mere caprice of the testator, no reason for it being assigned, and no complaint whatever being made of her conduct. Such a provision is wholly contrary to the policy of the law: it is an attempt to innovate upon the social system and destroy the union of families. In the same way, a general provision against marriage is void as being against the policy of the law. Secondly. The gift over to the charity can never take effect, because the subject of the gift is land, or money directed to be invested in land, and the gift over is void under the Mortmain Act. (9 G. 2, c. 36.) As the gift over cannot take effect, and no one can take advantage of the condition, the vested interest remains. Thirdly. The gift is void for uncertainty: what is the strict meaning of "residing with or dwelling in the house, or becoming part of a family?" In Fillingham v. Bromley (Turn. & Russ. 530), the direction to live and reside upon certain premises was held to be too uncertain for the Court to determine that there had been a forfeiture. Fourthly. The condition is in terrorem only, like a clause divesting a vested gift on marriage without consent. Lastly, the sister acted in ignorance of the condition, for upon hearing of the death of the Plaintiff's husband, she, before the codicil was discovered, went to his widow in her distress, and the act was the act of the sister, and not of the widow. The treasurer of the Bolton Dispensary is aware of the circumstances, yet makes no claim.

Mr. Elmsley appeared for the executors.

Mr. Rolt appeared for Joseph Ridgway.

[442] Mr. Bacon appeared for Thomas Stewart Kennedy, the first tenant in tail in existence under the will.

April 2. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. In this case there was only one point reserved. As I understand the will, the testator's wife was entitled, for her life, to the rent both of the lands devised and of those to be purchased; and, until any purchase should be made, she was entitled to the income of the personal estate directed to be laid out in land. It is an extremely long will, but this seems to me to be the effect of it.

By the codicil, the testator declared his will to be, that if the sister of his wife should, during the lifetime and widowhood of his wife, reside with or dwell in the house or place of residence of the wife, or become part of her family, then and in every and any such case, and for each and every day during which the sister should reside with or dwell in the house or place of residence of his wife, or become part of her family, his trustees should retain, from and out of the rents, interest, dividends, and other monies, payable or to be paid to his wife under or by virtue of his will or the trusts thereof, the sum of £100, and when so retained pay the same to a charity.

So that this direction necessarily implies that the payment to the charity was to be made out of the income given to the wife; and this income consisted of the rents of land, or of interest or dividends arising from personalty impressed with the character of land. Such direction to pay to the charity is therefore void, and, consequently, the direction to retain, so far as it was intended to operate for the benefit of the charity, was also void, and had no effect; and that purpose [443] failing, I think the direction to retain must fail altogether.

By the will, the annual income arising from the property is actually vested in the wife. By the codicil, though the testator declares his will only as to the sister, saying that if the sister shall do such acts, the trustees are to retain and pay over, yet such acts are acts which cannot properly be done without the consent of the wife. However, the object appears to have been, and I think the effect was, to impose a condition on the wife subsequent to the vesting, and the effect of which was to be the divesting in part of an interest previously vested. It ought therefore to be strictly construed, and as all the circumstances which the testator had in view do not concur, and as the purpose which he contemplated cannot be effected, it seems to me that the divesting cannot take effect, and therefore that the condition is void.

A great deal might have been said upon the uncertainty of the condition imposed; but I think the conclusion which I have stated, is that to which I must come. I have had a good deal of difficulty, but I consider this direction as in the nature of a condition subsequent, imposed on the wife; and that the condition subsequent having the effect of divesting interests previously vested, it ought to be strictly construed; and having regard to all the circumstances, if it fails in any of the circumstances it appears to me the condition fails.

I cannot say I think the condition itself was an illegal condition.

[444] EXTRACT FROM THE DECREE.—And his Lordship doth declare, that the direction contained in the codicil to the said testator's said will, bearing date the 22d day of November 1841, that, in the events therein mentioned, the trustees and executors should retain, &c., &c., is void and of no effect, and doth decree the same accordingly.

[444] POWELL v. WRIGHT. April 16, 1844.

Observations on what is termed the "substantial representation," in a suit of absent parties, and how far such absent parties are bound.

After bill filed but before subpoena served, the Defendant assigned the subject-matter of the suit. Held, that the assignee was a necessary party, and that the Court would, if necessary, grant an injunction to restrain any further assignment.

Scheduled creditors to a creditor's deed, who were not parties thereto, held not necessary parties to a suit by a subsequent incumbrancer, to have the monies out of which it was intended to pay such creditors raised, the trustees being parties.

This case came on upon objections for want of parties, under the 39th General Order of August 1841. (Ord. Can. 175.)

By indentures of the 13th and 15th of December 1834, certain estates were conveyed by Lord Wellesley and his eldest son to trustees, to raise a sum of £462,000. This was to be applied, in the first place, in payment of certain specified charges which did not exhaust the whole, and the residue was to be paid to Lord Wellesley for his own use.

By indenture of the 16th of December 1834, and made between Lord Wellesley of the one part, and Messrs. Springall and Thompson of the other part, Lord Wellesley appointed the surplus of the £462,000 to Messrs. Springall and Thompson, upon trust to pay, in such order and priority, and in such manner and way, in all respects, as the said trustees should in their discretion think fit, to the several persons whose names were specified in the [445] first and second schedules thereunder written, the several sums of money set opposite to their respective names, being respectively principal sums or debts alleged to be due by Lord Wellesley to such several persons, upon judgment, bond, and simple contract, or otherwise, or so much of the same several sums, as the said trustees should agree to pay, in full for such respective debts, and pay the residue to Lord Wellesley. The schedules contained the names of 130 creditors, but none of them were parties to the deed.

In 1836 Lord Wellesley granted to the Plaintiff an annuity, for securing which he charged the surplus of the £462,000, after satisfying the sums mentioned in the deed of the 16th of December 1834.

This bill was filed on the 9th of January 1841, to have the trusts of the deed of the 16th of December 1834 carried into execution, and to obtain payment of the Plaintiff's annuity which was in arrear.

None of the creditors mentioned in the deed of the 16th of December 1834 were made parties to the suit, but the bill prayed, that, if necessary, this bill might be taken to be a bill on behalf of all persons interested in the execution of the deed of the 16th of December 1834.

One of the Defendants, by his answer, submitted whether the several creditors named in the schedules to the deed of the 16th of December 1834 were properly represented in this suit, and he stated, that on the 2d of June 1842 Lord Wellesley and his son had conveyed the trust estate to John Smith of Regent Street, in fee, for securing a sum of £7000, which mortgage was created before the Defendant was served with the [446] subpoena in this suit, and he submitted whether John Smith was not a necessary or proper party to the suit.

Mr. Kindersley, and Mr. Chandlee, for the Plaintiff. The schedule creditors not being parties to the deed, acquired no interest in the estate, nor any right to enforce the trusts of the deed; Garrard v. Lord Lauderdale (3 Sim. 1, and 2 Russ. & M. 451), Foster v. Blackstone (1 Myl. & K. 297, and 3 Cl. & Fin. 456). Their numbers would also render it impossible to proceed in this suit, if they were all made parties.

Smith, being a purchaser pendente lite, is bound by the proceedings, and need not and cannot be made a party to this bill (see Bishop of Winchester v. Paine, 11 Ves. 197; Metcalf v. Pulvertoft, 2 Ves. & B. 205); this bill cannot therefore be said to be defective for want of parties.

Mr. Turner and Mr. Toller, contra. The creditors are necessary parties; for circumstances may have happened since the deed was communicated to them, which give them an indefeasible interest in the trusts of the deed. The Plaintiff has an interest opposed to that of the creditors; their rights cannot be adjudicated on in their absence. The Defendants, however, do not require that they should all be made parties: all they want is to have them substantially represented, by making some of the class Defendants, by which means they will be bound and prevented instituting a multiplicity of suits of their own.

[THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. Where some only of a class are made parties, it is a very inaccurate mode of expression to say that they represent the rest. The others may be perfectly ignorant of the proceedings, and [447] of what is really going on. It is a matter of convenience or necessity when the Court allows one to sue on behalf of the rest. In consequence of the difficulty arising from the number of parties interested, the Court relies on the assistance of one of the class, on the faith that having the same interest with the absent parties, the facts as affecting them will be fairly brought before the Court. But in such a case as this, how could you prevent another of the same class filing his own bill, if he will not submit to be represented by the person party to the record? Besides which, the Defendants named to represent the class would, in this case, be selected by the Plaintiff himself; if those only whom the Plaintiff pleases be made parties, it would be strange to say that the others, who are absent, would be bound.]

The principle of representation has, however, long been sanctioned; Cockburn v. Thompson (16 Ves. 321), Adair v. The New River Company (11 Ves. 444). Though the conveyance to Smith was after the filing of the bill, still it does not appear that the suit has been duly registered as directed by the 2 Vict. c. 11 (s. vii.), and therefore he would not be bound by it.

Mr. Kindersley, in reply. It is for the interest of all parties that the £462,000 should be raised, and the Court will then see to its due distribution.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. This case comes before me upon two objections for want of parties taken by the Defendant.

One objection is, that certain creditors named in the schedules to the deed of the 16th of December 1834 are [448] not any of them substantially made parties to this suit. The other is, that Smith, the assignee of the interest of Lord Wellesley, under a deed, executed subsequent to the filing of the bill, is not before the Court.

The case seems to be that Lord Wellesley, being indebted, and his estates being subject to charges of large amount, in 1834, soon after his son came of age, made arrangements for raising a large sum of money to satisfy the charges; and accordingly, in December 1834, a provision was made for raising £462,000, which was, in the first place, to be applied in satisfaction of the several charges on the estates which were enumerated in the deed. The amount of the charges was less than the amount to be raised, and the surplus was intended for the benefit of Lord Wellesley.

It seems to have been part of the same transaction, that this surplus should be applied in the particular manner stated in the deed of the 16th of December 1834. By this deed, Lord Wellesley appointed the surplus to Springall and Thompson, in trust to apply it as they should think fit, in payment of the scheduled creditors, and to hold the surplus upon trust for Lord Wellesley. There appear to be about 130 names set forth in the schedules, but none of them are parties to the deed. These creditors, not being parties to the deed, and not being in a situation to demand the execution of the trusts, must each depend upon Lord Wellesley for payment of his demand.

In 1836 grants of annuity were made to the Plaintiff by Lord Wellesley, which were secured upon the surplus.

After the great, I may say wilful, delay, that has taken place on the part of the Defendants, I am not [449] surprised that these objections for want of parties, in the nature of a dilatory, are now made by them. First, as to the persons mentioned in the schedule to this deed, I am by no means persuaded that it was necessary to make any of them parties; I do not know how they could make any claim or insist on the performance of the trust of a deed executed by Lord Wellesley, merely for making a provision for the payment of his own debts; and the deed giving to the creditors no interest in the estate, or in the produce of the estate.

If I were wrong in that conclusion, then comes the question, whether I am to consider them sufficiently represented in this suit. The argument is singular when you have regard to the position of the parties; for if, under this deed, the scheduled creditors have an interest to be protected, I cannot think that the solicitor of the Plaintiff is the proper person to act for them. That, however, is not the question before me; the question is, whether, supposing they are necessary parties, their interests will be sufficiently protected, not whether there is a representation of their interests.

Everybody must be conscious of the great difficulties which exist in cases of this kind. The Court in conformity with the principles of equity, has adopted a general rule, not to dispose of any matter, not to bind any man's interest, or make any declaration of any man's right, in his absence.

The complication of human affairs has, however, become such, that it is impossible always to act strictly on this general rule. Cases arise, in which, if you hold it necessary to bring before the Court every person having an interest in the question, the suit could never be brought to a conclusion. The consequence would be [450] that if the Court adhered to the strict rule, there would, in many cases, be a denial of justice. This has induced the Courts to sanction a relaxation of the rule. And, accordingly, they have said, if we can be satisfied that we have before the Court, persons whose interests are the same as the interests of those who are absent, we will be content to hear the cause upon the argument of such persons; and if we are then satisfied that the case has been fairly and honestly presented, we will order the distribution of the fund on the representation of the persons present. Though the Court will thus make a distribution, I have never heard that the proceedings in the suit are, to all intents, binding on the absent parties. So far as I know, it has never declared that the absent persons are to be cut off from all chance of correcting any error which, in consequence of their absence, may have been made to their prejudices. The Courts, in these cases, are always running the risk of doing what may be prejudicial to the absent parties.

A vague sort of expression has been used in these cases, that you must have a "substantial representation;" but it really comes to this, that in simple cases the Court requires all parties interested to be present, but in a complicated matter it is contented with something less. This is the reason why often, in vague language, you speak of "substantial representation." It is, however, a rule of convenience, and nothing is more vague; for the Court is under the necessity of considering the circumstances of each case, and the degree of difficulty in the proceeding: this makes it necessary to give minute and careful attention to the matters, to look at the nature of the case and of the suit, the Plaintiff's claim, and whether there are any adverse interests to protect.

I think, that if it is necessary to have some person to represent the interest of the creditors mentioned in [451] the deed, we have persons sufficient; we have the trustees, one of whom is the assignee of a beneficial interest under a creditor.

I lay out of sight the observation, that the individual who represents the trustees is the solicitor of the Plaintiff. There have been instances in which parties having adverse interests have been represented by one solicitor, and yet the case has been very properly conducted, in such a way as to bring before the Court everything necessary for maintaining the interest of each. In many cases, however, a very considerable and serious injury has resulted from that mode of conducting a case. Sir John Leach laid down the rule, that in no case whatever should a solicitor act for Plaintiff and Defendant; and if he found that was done, he took strong measures to put a stop to it: but the rule could not be enforced, for the solicitor had the power of resorting to the expedient of acting by another solicitor nominated by himself. Experience of this has made me come to the conclusion, that where the same person acts for persons supposed to have adverse interests, it is better that the truth should be known, than that there should be a pretence of different solicitors acting, when, in point of fact, there is but one; in the one case you have vigilance and attention paid to the subject, which would not be if there was a mutual accommodation of names. Having regard to the nature of the deed, and of the suit and other particulars, my opinion is, that the first objection must be overruled.

With respect to the other technical objection, as to Smith, I am inclined to think under the circumstances of this case, that he ought to be made a party to these proceedings, but that cannot be done by amendment.

[452] Mr. Kindersley. The objection is to the present record; however, we will undertake to bring him before the Court by a supplemental bill.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. If necessary, you may apply for an injunction to prevent the Defendant making future assignments. (Daly v. Kelly, 4 Dow's P. C. p. 440.)

ORDER.—It was declared that, according to the present state of the record, the parties mentioned in the first objection were not necessary parties in this suit, and the Plaintiff undertaking to file a supplement bill to make John Smith a party to this suit, it was ordered that the said objections be overruled, and the costs were reserved to the hearing.

[452] LEWIS v. SMITH. May 3, 1844.

Where an answer is found impertinent, the Plaintiff is entitled to the costs, and the Master has no discretion on the subject.

The facts of this case sufficiently appear from the judgment of the Court.

Mr. James Parker, for the Plaintiff.

Mr. Turner and Mr. Shebbeare, for the Defendant Green.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. This was a petition of the Defendant John Harry Green, praying that a certificate of impertinence in the answer, and a subpoena for costs, might be discharged.

In the month of January 1844 the Plaintiff, alleging impertinence in the answer of the Defendant, procured [453] the usual order of reference to the Master; and on the 6th of February, the Master being of opinion that the answer was impertinent to a large extent, made his report or certificate accordingly.

The Master, at the same time, stated, that in the view which he took of the case, it was not a case for costs, and that he should not give costs against the Defendant.

This was done, on the supposition that the Master had a discretion upon the subject of costs in such a case: but this was denied by the Plaintiff.

The certificate was filed on the 8th of February, and on that day the Plaintiff gave notice to the Defendant, that he should proceed to tax and, if necessary, to enforce payment of the costs in the usual manner; and, further, that the Defendant was not to refrain from excepting, on the supposition that he was not liable to costs.

To this the Defendant answered, that the Master had given no costs, and he relied on that.

The Plaintiff, however, persevered, and on further consideration the Master was of opinion, that according to the practice of the Court, the Plaintiff was entitled to costs, and that the Master had no discretion on the subject; and accordingly, after the warrant to expunge was taken out, and the costs left, the Taxing Master was requested to tax them. They were taxed, and a subpoena for payment of them was issued.

I am of opinion, that the Master has no authority to determine whether the Defendant is or is not to pay the costs occasioned by impertinence in his answer.

[454] Before the order of December 1833, after the impertinence had been found, the Plaintiff was entitled, as of course, to an order to expunge the impertinent matter, and for the taxation and payment of the costs.(1) And the 22d Order (Ordines Can. 50), directing the Master to expunge the impertinence, and enabling him, without further order, to tax the costs, did not do more than relieve the Plaintiff from the expence of obtaining an order, which he was previously entitled to as of course.

The Master was enabled to do, without order, that which before he could only do under an order, which the Plaintiff obtained as of course.

It appears to me that the Master's second thoughts were right, and that he had no discretion to refuse the costs which the Plaintiff demanded.

On reading the affidavits, and after communicating with the Master, I have great doubt whether the Defendant was really misled, or under any mistake which prevented him from endeavouring to obtain relief from the report in due time.

Nevertheless, it may have been so; and if the Defendant now informs me that he is advised that he has good ground for excepting to the report, I think that I ought to give him leave to do so, and to stay the proceeding for the costs until the exceptions are disposed of.(2)

If he does not now intend to except, I must dismiss this petition.

[455] HARVEY v. SHELTON. July 3, 4, 1844.

[S. C. 13 L. J. Ch. 466. 9 Will. 3, c. 15, was repealed by the Arbitration Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 49). On point as to time in which motion must be made, see now R. S. C. O. 64, rr. 7, 14; In re Corporation of Huddersfield and Jacomb, 1874, L. R. 17 Eq. 476; In re Gallop and Central Queensland Meat Export Company, 1890, 25 Q. B. D. 230.]

Award set aside, on the ground of interviews having taken place between the arbitrator and one party, in the absence of the other.

Similar misconduct on the part of the person applying, will not prevent the Court setting aside the award, for the matter concerns the due administration of justice.

(1) See Hinde's Pr. 256, 1 Turn. & V. Pr. 782, 1 Newland's Pr. 277, 1 Harrison's Chanc. Pr. 193; Muscott v. Hahed, 4 B. C. C. 222; and Tyrrel v. Redifer, 1 Mer. 132.

(2) See also Desanges v. Gregory, 6 Sim. 473; and Everett v. Prythergh, 12 Sim. 464.

A motion was made to dismiss a bill, in pursuance of an award; it came on upon the last day, on which, under the statute, an application could be made to set aside the award. The Respondent then made objections to the award, and the motion was ordered to stand over, with liberty for the Respondent to give notice of motion to dispute the award. Held, that this operated as an extension of the time.

This was an application on the part of the Plaintiff, to set aside an award; the material circumstances relating to which were as follows:—

Disputes arose between the Plaintiff and Defendant, which gave rise to a cross-suit, which proceeded to a decree to take the accounts. The parties thereupon referred the matters in difference to the arbitration of a Mr. Wakefield.

Two meetings took place between the parties before the arbitrator, on the 26th and 27th of September 1843, respectively; and on the second occasion, it was arranged, that the accounts should be referred to Mr. Norris, an accountant. It was sworn, on the one side, that at the second meeting it was agreed that a further meeting of the parties should take place before the arbitrator; but this was denied by the other side.

Norris, however, proceeded in the examination of the accounts, but before the award was made, the following circumstance took place, which was relied on as invalidating the award:—

"On the 6th of December Shelton was sent for by the arbitrator, to meet him at the office of the accountant, on which occasion he was called upon to explain an entry of £350 in the ledger, and which [456] Shelton pointed out to the arbitrator to have been accidentally overlooked by the accountant, and with which the arbitrator was satisfied; and nothing else whatever passed or took place at such meeting, in relation to the matters in reference, or any of them. On the 27th of January Shelton was again sent to by the arbitrator, to meet him at the office of the accountant, when he was again called upon by the arbitrator to explain, as he thought, an omission of £37, 10s. in the account, and one or two other small omissions, all of which sums Shelton pointed out; upon which the arbitrator was satisfied, and the accountant expressed his surprise that he had overlooked the same, and regretted to have thus troubled Shelton; and nothing else passed between Shelton and the arbitrator on such last occasion, or at any other time, except in giving the explanations herein-before mentioned and required by such arbitrator."

Neither the Plaintiff nor any person on his behalf was present at these meetings between Shelton and the arbitrator.

On the other hand, it was objected, that Harvey had sent to the arbitrator a letter relating to the matters, which he had not communicated to the other side, and that he also had attended the arbitrator and accountant in the absence of Shelton.

Mr. W. T. Daniel, in support of the motion, contended, that the award was invalid; first, because at the second meeting, it had been agreed that a further meeting of the parties should take place, yet the award had been made without any such further meeting having been had. In Dodington v. Hudson (1 Bingham, 384), the De-[457]-fendant's attorney, swore he understood the arbitrator meant to have called another meeting, and none having been had, the Court set aside the award. So in Pepper v. Gorham (1 Moore, 148), where arbitrators, who had proceeded in a reference, informed the Defendant, who was present at the meeting, that they would suspend their proceedings till the books of account had been referred to, it was held, that the having afterwards made an award in his absence, without examining such books, was a good ground for setting aside the award. And in Walker v. Frobisher (6 Ves. 70; and see In re Plews, Q. B. January 29, 1845), an award was set aside, the arbitrator having received evidence, after notice to the parties that he would receive no more, in which they acquiesced.

Secondly, because there had been private meetings between Shelton and the arbitrator, where statements had been made in the absence of the Plaintiff, which the Plaintiff had not the opportunity of meeting, and which influenced the arbitrator's decision; and that this was manifestly contrary to the first principles of justice.

Thus where a private examination of a party by arbitrators had taken place, the Court of Common Pleas set aside an award: In the matter of Hick (8 Taunt. 694).

Thirdly, he relied on errors in the award, the particulars of which, however, it is not necessary to state.

Mr. Turner and Mr. Glasse, contra. On the first point, the evidence shews distinctly that there was no arrangement made at the second meeting for a further hearing. All that then remained to be done, was a matter of account, to be settled by the arbitrator with the assistance of the accountant.

[458] Secondly, the interviews between the arbitrator and Shelton on the subject of the accounts, do not invalidate the award. It was a mere mercantile arbitration. In Malson v. Trower (Ry. & Moo. 17) each of the parties had been examined in the absence of the other, and it having been objected that the award was void in consequence, Chief Justice Abbott said, "It does not appear that either party desired to be present when the other was examined; legal men indeed usually examine one party in the presence of the other, but among mercantile persons a different practice prevails; the umpire here was a mercantile man, and the Defendants not having expressed a desire to be present at the examination of the Plaintiffs, cannot now object to its having taken place in their absence." Again the Plaintiff himself has been guilty of equal irregularity by communicating privately, by letter, with the arbitrator, and by attending alone.

Mr. Parker, for other parties.

Mr. Daniel, in reply.

Watson on Arbitration (p. 75, 217, 249), and Fetherstone v. Cooper (9 Ves. 69), were also cited.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. This is a motion to set aside an award, to which two distinct objections are taken. The first objection is, that at the meeting on the 27th of September 1843, when all parties were heard, it was distinctly arranged, or at least it was by Mr. Harvey understood to be distinctly arranged, that there should be [459] another meeting of all the parties before the arbitrator, for further discussing their rights and interests; yet, contrary to that arrangement or understanding, no such subsequent meeting ever took place, and that on this account, the proceedings were irregular and the award ought to be set aside.

It is next alleged, that between the meeting of the 27th of September and the date of the award on the 13th of February 1844, when the award was made, the arbitrator had two private meetings with one of the litigant parties, in relation to the matters which were the subjects of the arbitration; which is contrary to the first principles of justice, and that in consequence of that irregularity and impropriety the award ought to be set aside.

I shall make but one observation upon the first of these objections, because the really material one is the second. I think that both parties may very reasonably be supposed to be mistaken on this point, for each of the two parties having been heard at length before the arbitrator, and having stated what he thought fit, the matter was referred to an accountant, agreed on by both parties, in whose hands the books and documents relating to the matter in question were to be deposited, and both parties were to have access to them in the presence of the accountant. Now it might reasonably enough have been supposed, on the one hand, when the several parties had discussed their rights before the arbitrator, if nothing remained but to take the accounts by the examination of the books, in the ordinary way, that there might be no occasion for any other meeting before the arbitrator, for the purpose of adversely discussing their rights; on the other hand, it was perfectly reasonable for either party to suppose, that if, upon the examination of the books, disputed [460] items or questions should arise, the parties should have the opportunity of discussing them before the arbitrator. I think that the state of things was such, and the facts of such a nature, that one may reasonably suppose, that each party formed some erroneous notion on the subject.

If this matter had afterwards proceeded with perfect regularity, I should have conceived, that it was open to the arbitrator to have a further meeting or not, according as the exigency of the matter might require, and that if the matter did not require a further meeting, he might have properly made his award without one. This is the view I take of the first question.

With regard to the second question, we must look to the situation in which these parties stood. There were questions upon the accounts which might have to be discussed. The accounts were to be examined, and it might be material that each party should have access not only to the books, but also to the accountant who was examining them for the purpose of drawing conclusions from them. Mr. Shelton seems to have been perfectly familiar with the accounts and the books; the other party had not had the same opportunities. The arbitrator distinctly states, that the books were to be left with him, and that either party was to be at liberty to examine such books in his presence. It does not appear whether Mr. Shelton ever availed himself of that right, but my impression from the affidavits is, that he did not; though he certainly had a right to attend Mr. Norris to look at the books. I think it must be considered that he had a right to make such communications to Mr. Norris, who was not the Judge, but merely an assistant on that occasion. Mr. Harvey, whatever might have been his right, seems, with the consent of Mr. Norris, to have gone a very considerable [461] length, for he attended Mr. Norris, had an opportunity of seeing the abstracts and extracts which Mr. Norris had made from the accounts, which he corrected and checked by the books, and, according to the statement, Mr. Norris was, in general, satisfied with what was done. It does not appear that, at the period to which I am now referring, he had had any communication whatever with the arbitrator.

The matter seems to have gone on till the month of December 1843, when this circumstance took place: Mr. Norris found himself in difficulty with respect to the sum of £350; he communicated it to Mr. Wakefield, who also had a difficulty on it, and Mr. Wakefield then summoned Mr. Shelton, one of the litigant parties, to attend him, for the purpose of explaining this matter. It is greatly to be regretted that he did not, at the same time, summon Mr. Harvey to attend him. I must assume that Mr. Harvey had an interest in the question respecting the item of £350, because the account was to be taken in which he was interested; however, Mr. Wakefield sends for Mr. Shelton for his opinion, consults him on the matter, and after that consultation and in the absence of Mr. Harvey, he becomes, in some way or other, satisfied in respect of that item of £350. Whether the result of such satisfaction was accordant with or contrary to the interest of Mr. Harvey does not appear. There is no proof, nor in such a case do I apprehend there could be proof, that the result to which Mr. Wakefield came was in any way prejudicial to Mr. Harvey. However, we have this state of things: a question arises affecting the interest of Mr. Harvey; the Judge has a private interview with one party, discusses the matter with him, and through the representations made by that one in the absence of the other, he becomes satisfied, and comes to a conclusion on it.

[462] A similar proceeding took place on a subsequent occasion. There were other items in respect of which difficulties again arose; Mr. Shelton is again summoned, the other party is not summoned; Mr. Shelton has a private interview with the arbitrator, the matter is discussed between them, explanations are given, the result of which explanation is, that the arbitrator is satisfied, and the interest of Mr. Harvey, whether for or against him, is again bound by the decision of the arbitrator (so far as it can be binding), which was made in his absence.

It is so ordinary a principle in the administration of justice, that no party to a cause can be allowed to use any means whatsoever to influence the mind of the Judge, which means are not known to and capable of being met and resisted by the other party, that it is impossible, for a moment, not to see, that this was an extremely indiscreet mode of proceeding, to say the very least of it. It is contrary to every principle to allow of such a thing, and I wholly deny the difference which is alleged to exist between mercantile arbitrations and legal arbitrations. The first principles of justice must be equally applied in every case. Except in the few cases where exceptions are unavoidable, both sides must be heard, and each in the presence of the other. In every case in which matters are litigated, you must attend to the representations made on both sides, and you must not, in the administration of justice, in whatever form, whether in the regularly constituted Courts or in arbitrations, whether before lawyers or merchants, permit one side to use means of influencing the conduct and the decisions of the Judge, which means are not known to the other side.

[463] It is argued in this case, that there has here been equal fault on the other side, and that Lord Eldon, from whom every word that has fallen is entitled to the most profound attention, has said, that if an act of this sort is called in question, the party who seeks relief ought not himself to be to blame. It is stated, on this occasion, that in the matter of this reference, Mr. Harvey, who now complains, has himself been guilty of just the same erroneous conduct as Mr. Shelton, and that as to Mr. Shelton it was not his spontaneous act, for that he remained passive until he was invited by the arbitrator to attend. The truth of this matter does not appear satisfactorily upon the affidavits; but with respect to the letter of the 19th of January 1844, I cannot allow such a matter to pass without expressing my disapprobation of it. Mr. Harvey, in my opinion, was acting extremely wrong in writing such a letter to the arbitrator, unless he sent a copy of it to the other side; I conceive that he was at liberty to make his own representation, provided he imparted it to the other side, but otherwise it was wrong. This sort of misconduct sometimes, though rarely, occurs here; long statements are occasionally sent to me by one side; but I hand them over to the other side, and take care that no kind of communication is made to me without the other party knowing it. I think the arbitrator should have done so with that letter, and there being no proof that it was ever sent to Mr. Shelton, I cannot let the circumstance pass without expressing my disapprobation.

Though there was some statement made to the arbitrator by Mr. Harvey, I do not know what it was, unless I can collect it from the letter of the 19th of January; but assuming a private statement to have been made, I must add, that if there had also been a private interview, and an erroneous and improper private inter-[464]-view, between Mr. Harvey and the arbitrator, I should have found it very difficult to say, that this species of misconduct on the one side was to be an excuse for the mode of proceeding which was adopted on the other. This is not a matter of mere private consideration between two adverse parties, but a matter concerning the due administration of justice, in which all persons who may ever chance to be litigant, in Courts of Justice or before arbitrators, have the strongest interest in maintaining that the principles of justice shall be carefully adhered to in every case.

Under these circumstances, I am of opinion that this award cannot stand, and I must therefore grant this motion.

Another point arose in this discussion, with regard to the time at which the application was made, and which it is thought convenient to separate from the other points in the case.

By the 9 & 10 W. 3, c. 15, s. 2, any arbitration or umpirage, procured by corruption or undue means, shall be judged and esteemed void and of none effect, and accordingly be set aside by any Court of law or Equity, so as complaint of such corruption or undue practice be made in the Court where the rule is made for submission to such arbitration or umpirage, before the last day of the next term after such arbitration or umpirage made and published to the parties.

The award was made on the 13th of February 1844, and communicated on the 30th March. On the 15th April 1844 Shelton moved, pursuant to the terms of the award, to dismiss the bill without costs, but Harvey ob-[465]-jecting, that neither the reference nor the award had been made orders of Court, the motion was ordered to stand over.

On the 18th of April the reference and award were, ex parte, made orders of Court.

On the 8th of May (which was the last day of the next term after the award had been made and published) Shelton's motion to dismiss was brought on, when Harvey's counsel stating that he had objections to the award, the motion of Shelton was ordered to stand over till the first day of the following term, and liberty was given to Harvey, if he should be so advised, to give notice of motion to dispute the award. He gave notice, accordingly, of the present motion on the 18th of May.

It was now (on the 3d and 4th of July) objected, on the part of Shelton, that the time limited by the statute (9 & 10 W. 3, c. 15, s. 2) having expired, the award could not be now set aside: Rushworth v. Barron (3 Dowl. P. C. 317, 1 Har. & W. 122); and that the time could not be extended. Auriol v. Smith (Turn. & R. 121), Allardes v. Campbell (Bunb. 265, Barn. K. B. 152, and Tur. & R. 131, n.).

On the other hand, it was said, that the time allowed by the statute had been extended by the leave given on the 8th of May; that the order to make the submission a rule ought to have been obtained before the award had been made (Pownall v. King, 6 Ves. 9), and that the motion to make an award an order of Court was not a motion of course, [466] but a special motion to be made upon notice. Williams v. Page (1 Hare, 280).

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. The question is, whether such a complaint has been made within the time limited by the statute, as to enable the party to have the benefit of his objection to the award. I think, under the circumstances, that I must consider there was a sufficient complaint. There was a motion for a proceeding to carry the award into execution, which was brought on upon the very last day, on the day on which the time expired within which application could be made for relief. The order asked was then resisted, by an allegation, made in Court of a complaint against the award, and a request was made that an opportunity might be given for making a regular and formal application. I think, under the circumstances, I must give weight to that, though I confess it does not appear so clear as one would wish it to be.

The form of the order was next brought to the consideration of the Court, and it was argued that the order should be drawn up nunc pro tunc.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS directed the order to be drawn up as of this day, and the facts relating to the different applications to be stated on the face of the order. He, however, gave no costs.

[467] MACKENZIE v. TAYLOR. July 17, 1844.

[See Hilliard v. Fulford, 1876, 4 Ch. D. 393.]

Executors directed to convert and invest the testator's property, allowed it to be enjoyed in specie by the tenant for life. Three years after her death, they accounted for the value and paid it into Court. Held, that they ought to pay interest from the death of the tenant for life to the day of such payment.

A residuary estate was divisible amongst several persons. An account was made up, and the adults received their shares. The infants filed a bill for an account against the executors and the other residuary legatees. The latter being satisfied, deprecated the proceedings. The accounts turned out to be substantially correct. Held, that the costs were payable out of the Plaintiffs' share alone.

The testator gave his residuary personal estate to his executors and trustees, upon trust, as soon as convenient after his death, to convert into money and invest the same. One moiety of the residue was given to Mr. Newton, and one-fourth was given to Mrs. Mackenzie for life, with remainder to her children.

The testator died in 1824, and Mrs. Mackenzie died in 1832. This bill was filed by her children against the executors and Mr. Newton for the administration of the estate. The executors, but with the concurrence of Mrs. Mackenzie, had neglected to convert and invest a part of the testator's property, but three years after her death, they accounted for the value and paid the amount into Court. This gave rise to the first question.

The second question was as to the costs. It appeared that the executors had accounted to Newton for his share of the residue: being satisfied, he by his answer objected to the proceedings, and, at the first hearing, resisted the taking of any accounts. On the cause coming on for further directions, the costs had to be provided for; and as the circumstances of the case were not such as to render the executors liable to pay the costs, the question was, whether the costs were to be paid out of the whole residue, including that received by Newton, or out of the Plaintiffs' share only.

[468] Mr. George Turner and Mr. Hithcock, for the Plaintiffs, contended that the executors were chargeable with interest on that part of the estate which they had neglected to convert; and that as this was a suit for the administration, the whole residue ought to bear the costs.

Mr. Baily, for the widow of the testator.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Piggott, for the executors and Mr. Newton, contended, that as the executors had, with the concurrence of Mrs. Mackenzie, and for the convenience of her family, refrained from converting this part of the property, they ought not to be charged with interest.

Secondly, that as Mr. Newton, who had received his share, was perfectly satisfied with the accounts, and had deprecated all litigation, he ought not to be ordered to pay any portion of the costs of the suit out of his portion of the residue.

Mr. Turner, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. There are two questions in this case. The first is, whether the executors and trustees are to be charged with interest on the infant's share of the property or on any part of it; the other relates to the costs of the suit.

It seems that the executors rendered an account which turned out to be nearly correct, except as to the value of a steam-engine, and as to that sum, I am of opinion that no interest is chargeable. With respect to the rest, it was given to Mrs. Mackenzie for life, with remainder to [469] her children. It seems that the testator's property consisted of matters capable of personal enjoyment, and no doubt the strict duty of the trustees was to convert and invest the produce, and then to pay the income to the tenant for life, and preserve the corpus for the children. This was not done on this occasion, but the tenant for life was allowed to have the enjoyment during her life; the executors have, however, charged themselves with the value of those articles not converted into money. There can be no doubt of what was the duty of the executors; the tenant for life acquiesced, and therefore had no right or reason to complain; but that does not apply to the children, whose interest was neglected. I am of opinion that the executors are chargeable with interest at the rate of 4 per cent. from the death of the tenant for life to the time when the money was paid into Court.

With respect to the costs, the bill was filed by the infants for an account of the residue. It appears that a distribution had previously been made, of all the property except the share of the infants. The question is, whether the distribution was satisfactory to Newton. It appears from the scope of his answer that he was satisfied with the account stated; and he resisted the account at the hearing. Taking the whole transaction, is it not clear that the bill was filed for the benefit of the infants alone? I do not see any reason for charging one who does not require the accounts to be taken, with the costs of a proceeding which he resists.

If the accounts had been unsettled, then it would have been for the benefit of all that they should be taken, and each ought then to contribute towards the expence. Newton had received all he required, and I think from his answer he precluded himself from having the accounts [470] taken. There is no reason for charging him with the costs of these proceedings; they must be paid out of the fund recovered by the suit.

[470] LEWIS v. SMITH. March 27, May 2, 8, 1844.

The common injunction against several Defendants, may be dissolved as to some, before all have answered, and the proper course of proceeding for that purpose is, for those who have answered to obtain an order nisi, as of course.

An action at law had been commenced against the Plaintiff by Messrs. Smith & Co., whose firm consisted of five persons, two resident in Liverpool, and three in Australia. The Plaintiff filed this bill against Messrs. Smith and others praying, amongst other things, an injunction to restrain the proceedings at law, and the common injunction was obtained for want of answer. The two partners resident in England having filed their answer, obtained, as of course, an order nisi to dissolve the injunction. The other three partners resident abroad had not answered.

Mr. Turner and Mr. Lewin now moved to make absolute the order nisi for dissolving the injunction.

Mr. James Parker, contra, argued, first, that the common injunction could not be dissolved until all the Defendants had answered, for that is the form of the order for the injunction, and the answers of the other Defendants might be most material, and that which would be a defence to one would be a defence to all; besides, it would be useless to dissolve as to some of the Plaintiffs at law only, for the action could not proceed while any Co-plaintiff is enjoined; that the only exceptions to this rule were collusion and immateriality. Secondly, that if it could be dissolved before all the Co-plaintiffs at law had answered, then that the order nisi ought not to have [471] been obtained ex parte, but upon a special application to the Court. Thirdly, that the order nisi which had been obtained was to dissolve as to all, and that this was clearly irregular.

Mr. Turner, in reply. The Defendants have proceeded according to the ordinary practice. If the answer of the other Defendants be material, that must be proved upon shewing cause.

Stanton* (2 Y. & J. 75); Lord Delvin v. Smyth (Mos. 354); Todd v. Dismor (2 Sim. & S. 477); St. John v. Cargill (3 Anst. 933); Naylor v. Middleton (2 Mad. 131); Montague v. Hill (4 Russ. 128); Nanney v. Vaughan (8 Sim. 439); Glasscott v. The Copper Miners' Company (11 Sim. 314); and the cases referred to in the judgment of the Court, were cited.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. I think it right to look at the cases and the form of the order. There may be inconvenience on both sides; but as some of the parties are on the opposite side of the world, it would be hard indeed if the injunction could never be dissolved against those who are here.

May 2. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. In this case, the Plaintiff obtained the common order for an injunction to restrain the Defendants who had not [472] answered, from proceeding in an action at law against the Plaintiff.

The Defendants against whom the order was made were five in number; two of them are in this country, the other three are abroad.

The two Defendants who are here, having answered, have obtained an order of course to dissolve the injunction, unless cause be shewn to the contrary.

The order appears to me to be somewhat ambiguously expressed, but I think that I must construe it to be an order to dissolve the injunction as against the Defendants upon whose petition it was obtained, unless cause be shewn to the contrary.

The Plaintiff contends he is not bound to shew or to undertake to shew any cause, upon the order of two Defendants, before the other three have answered.

Beyond all question the general rule is, that the injunction is not to be dissolved till all the Defendants have answered, and this being so, it is unusual, and generally useless, for some of the Defendants to attempt to dissolve the injunction till all who are enjoined have answered.

There are authorities which appear to me to shew the mode of proceeding in such cases.

The case of Joseph v. Doubleday (1 Ves. & B. 497) was under the consideration of Lord Eldon, at different times during several years. There were two sets of Defendants com-[473]-prised in the injunction, Doubleday and others, who desired to dissolve the injunction, and Mowbray and others. In August 1810 Lord Eldon, upon a special motion made by Doubleday and others, made an order nisi to dissolve the injunction against them. On a motion afterwards made to make that order absolute, and also to dissolve the injunction against Mowbray and others, who had not answered, exceptions to the answer of Doubleday and others were shewn as cause, and the usual reference was made to the Master.

It was suggested, in the argument for the Plaintiff in the present case, that in all such cases, the order nisi ought always to be asked for by special motion; but the proceeding in Joseph v. Doubleday was conducted otherwise.

Doubleday and others having put in a further answer, obtained, as of course, an order nisi to dissolve the injunction as against them, and in July 1812 that order was made absolute on the merits. And subsequently, in the year 1816, the answer of Mowbray and others being put in, they obtained an order nisi to dissolve, as of course, and afterwards that order was made absolute and the injunction was dissolved generally.

Again, in Naylor v. Middleton (2 Mad. 131) an injunction being obtained against two, one, on putting in his answer, moved specially to dissolve the injunction as to both. This motion was refused with costs, on the ground that an order nisi was necessary on the behalf of the Defendant moving.

[474] And in Todd v. Dismor (2 S. & St. 477) an injunction was obtained against three. One having answered, untruly suggested that all had answered, and thereupon obtained an order nisi to dissolve the injunction against all. This was irregular, and the Vice-Chancellor said, one Defendant having answered, has a right to move to dissolve the injunction as against himself, but must not in the order nisi suggest, contrary to the fact, that all have answered.

And in The Imperial Gas Light Company v. Clarke and Dixon (Younge, 580), Dixon having put in his answer, obtained an order nisi to dissolve the injunction. It was shewn, as special cause, that Clarke, in whose name the action was brought, had not put in his answer, but the injunction was dissolved as to Dixon.

These authorities seem to me sufficient to shew, that an injunction against several Defendants to restrain them from proceedings at law, may be dissolved, as against some of them before all have answered, and that the proper course of proceeding for that purpose is, for those who have answered to obtain an order nisi, and that the Plaintiff must thereupon shew cause why the order nisi should not be made absolute.

May 8. On this day, Mr. Kindersley and Mr. James Parker shewed cause. They argued that as it appeared from the answer already put in, that the transactions were known to the parties in Sydney alone, to whom the partners in England by their answer referred, the Court ought not to dissolve the injunction until the Plaintiff [475] had acquired full information from the partners in Sydney, who alone were competent to give it.

Mr. Turner and Mr. Lewin, contra, contended that the injunction ought to be dissolved as to the Defendants who had answered, especially as it appeared, from the statements in the bill, that the question between the parties was one proper to be determined in a Court of law, and that the bill was in fact demurrable.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS, under the circumstances, declined to dissolve the injunction.

[S. C. 13 L. J. Ch. 322 ; 8 Jur. 526.]

Devise to A. for life, with remainder to her first child and his or her heirs ; but if such child should die under the age of twenty-one years without leaving issue, then in like manner to the second, third, and every other child of A., regard being had to their seniority, and to their respective deaths under age without leaving lawful issue ; for, in case of issue, it was the testator's will that they should inherit the estate, and he thereby gave the same to him or her, and to his or her heirs accordingly. But in case A. died without leaving issue of her body, or, having issue, such issue should die under the age of twenty-one without leaving issue, then he devised the estate over.

A. never had any issue. Held, that she took a life-estate only.

Joshua Nunn, by his will, dated in June 1787, devised the estate in question, which was of copyhold tenure to his wife Protesia for life. After her decease, he devised the same to his daughter Mary Ann Nunn for life, and from and after her decease, he gave the same to the first child of the body of Mary Ann Nunn, whether male or female, and to his or her heirs or assigns for ever ; but if such child should depart this life under the age of twenty-one years, without leaving issue of his or her body lawfully begotten, then [476] he devised the estate to the second child of the body of his said daughter Mary Ann Nunn, and to the heirs and assigns of such second child ; and in case the second child should die under the age of twenty-one years, and without leaving issue of his or her body lawfully begotten, then he devised the estate to the third child of the body of his said daughter Mary Ann

Nunn, and so on to the fourth, fifth, and all and every other child and children of the body of his said daughter to be begotten as aforesaid, regard being had to the seniority of age and priority of birth of such child and children, and to their several and respective deaths under age, and without leaving lawful issue of their bodies; for, in case of issue, it was the testator's will that such issue should inherit the aforesaid estate, and he thereby gave the same to him, or her, and to his or her heirs accordingly.

But in case his daughter Mary Ann departed this life without leaving issue of her body lawfully begotten, or, having issue, such issue should die under the age of twenty-one years without leaving issue lawfully to be begotten as aforesaid, then he devised the estate, with the appurtenances, to Mary Ann Goymour for her life, and after her decease he gave the same to Nunn Goymour in fee.

The testator died in 1787; his wife Protesia died in 1801; whereupon the devised estate became vested in the daughter Mary Ann, the wife of the Defendant Pigge. She died in 1832 without having had any child; but having in 1816 suffered a customary recovery of the property, under which the Defendant claimed. The Plaintiff was the heir of Nunn Goymour, to whom the estate was given in fee in the events contemplated by the will; and Mary Ann Goymour, his [477] mother, having died in 1801, he by this bill made claim to the estate.

The principal question was, whether Mrs. Pigge was, under the limitations contained in the above will, tenant in tail, or tenant for life only.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. E. G. White, for the Plaintiff. Mrs. Pigge was tenant for life only under the limitations contained in the will. The first limitation is expressly to her "for life." Under the next limitation "to the first child of her body," &c., her children took as purchasers; and there is an executory limitation over to the second child, in case of the death of the first under twenty-one without leaving issue of his body, and similar limitations to the other children.

The subsequent clause is that on which the Defendant will rely—namely, "in case his daughter departed this life without leaving issue of her body lawfully begotten, or, having such issue, such issue should die under the age of twenty-one years without leaving issue lawfully to be begotten as aforesaid." In this clause the word "issue" must be construed "children," which has been frequently done in other cases; 2 Powell's Devises, 537, Ginger dem. White v. White (Willes, 348), Goodright dem. Docking v. Dunham (Douglas, 251), Carter v. Bentall (2 Beav. 351). The words "as aforesaid" have the effect of referring to the prior limitation to the "children," and of attaching to the word "issue" the force of the antecedent expression "children." The limitation over is therefore limited to a failure of the objects of the [478] prior limitation, Ellicombe v. Gompertz (3 Myl. & Cr. 127), and consequently the life-estate of Mrs. Pigge was not enlarged by the subsequent devise on the death of Mrs. Pigge without leaving issue, &c.

The limitation over is therefore good, and in the events which have happened has taken effect.

But the Defendant will insist, that whatever might have been the extent of Mrs. Pigge's estate, and even if she were mere tenant for life, the limitation over, being contingent (which we admit, it being a limitation over with a double aspect: Doe dem. Davy v. Burnell (6 Term R. 30, and 1 Bos. & P. 215), was destroyed by the recovery; but the answer is, that the estate being copyhold, the freehold which was in the lord was sufficient to support all contingent estates, Scriven on Copyholds (page 476), and to prevent their being destroyed by the recovery suffered by a mere tenant for life.

Mr. Turner and Mr. Chandless, contra. The daughter, Mrs. Pigge, took an estate tail, which, with all the subsequent remainders, has been destroyed by the customary recovery. A gift to A. for life with a limitation over, in case of A.'s dying without issue, prima facie, gives an estate tail to A.: it is for the Plaintiff to make out the contrary.

The general scope and object of the will is, that the children and their issue should all inherit, and that the estate should not go over until there should be an entire [479] failure of such issue. The testator says, "in case of issue, it was his will that such issue should inherit the aforesaid estate, and he thereby gave the same to him or her, and to his or her heirs accordingly." This is the intention. Now the general rule is, that where you find a limitation to a class of issue which does not enable all the issue to take, and there is a gift over upon a general failure of issue, an estate tail is created in the parent; consequently, if it can be shewn that the prior limitations do not enable the whole of the issue to take, the words "dying without leaving issue," &c., must be construed so as to give an estate tail to Mrs. Pigge. Here it is to be observed, that in the gift to the second and subsequent children, the words of limitation to his or her heirs, &c., are omitted, so that they would take estates for life, and their issue would be unprovided for, unless you hold that the mother took an estate tail.

The limitation under which the Plaintiff claims has been destroyed by the recovery. Mr. Rogers, for a mortgagee, asked to have the bill dismissed against him with costs.

Mr. Kindersley, in reply. The word "estate," in which the gift to the third and subsequent child is expressed, would carry the fee, as in the case of the first and second child; and then the testator afterwards adds that regard is to be had to the respective deaths of such children under age, and without leaving lawful issue of their bodies, &c. The issue, therefore, of the second and subsequent children would be provided for under the prior limitation.

[480] The following cases were cited; Bamfield v. Popham (1 P. Wms. 54), Doe d. Lyde v. Lyde (1 Term R. 593), Doe d. Gilman v. Elvey (4 East, 313), Malcolm v. Taylor (2 Russ. & Myl. 416), Franks v. Price (3 Beav. 182), Doe d. Lean v. Lean (1 Q. B. Rep. 229), Lewis d. Ormond v. Waters (6 East, 336), Esdaile v. Gall (1 Russ. & Myl. 540), Parr v. Swindels (4 Russ. 283), Nicholl v. Nicholl (2 W. Black. 1159), Tarbut v. Tarbut (2 Jarman on Wills, 375), Hutchinson v. Stephens (1 Keen, 240), Grimshaw v. Pickup (9 Sim. 591), Vanderplank v. King (3 Hare, 1).

May 6. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The question is, what estate the testator's daughter, Mary Ann, took under the will? The Defendant alleges that she took an estate tail; that a recovery of the estate was suffered; and that by reason of such recovery and a settlement and will, the estate became vested in the Defendant. The Plaintiff, on the contrary, alleges that the will gave a life-estate only to Mary Ann Nunn; and if such be the case, he is entitled to the estate under the devise over.

After a devise to Protesia for life, there is another distinct devise to Mary Ann for life; it is clear that the intention was to give to Mary Ann an estate for life only; and the question is, whether the words which the testator has used are such as necessarily enlarge that estate to an estate tail. The gift of a life-estate to Mary Ann is immediately followed by gifts to the children, successively, in words which probably give suc-[481]-cessive estates tail to the children. The testator contemplated the children of Mary Ann as the persons who, after her, were to have the succession; and the issue of the bodies of the children, respectively, were to have the succession after them; and such children and issue, respectively, being, by the express words he has used, shewn to be in his contemplation, he has used the words upon which the question arises, "in case my said daughter Mary shall depart this life without leaving issue of her body lawfully begotten, or having issue, such issue shall die under the age of twenty-one years without leaving issue lawfully to be begotten as aforesaid." I am of opinion that these words must be construed with reference to the preceding clauses, and that the words "issue of the body," when used with reference to the daughter, must be understood to mean the "children," to whom, subject to the daughter's life-estate, the property is previously devised. It is as if the testator had said, "in case my daughter shall depart this life without having any child, or having children, such children shall die under twenty-one years of age without leaving lawful issue." The issue of the children being issue of the mother, the estate was to go over only in the event of there being no issue of the mother, but still the words do not appear to me to be such, as to connect the life-estate given to the mother with the implied gift to the issue, and to give to the mother an estate tail by implication.

I am therefore of opinion, that Mary Ann, the testator's daughter, upon the true construction of the will, took only an estate for life, and that the Plaintiff is now entitled to the estate under the devise over.

Let an account be taken of the rents for six years before the bill was filed, and declare that the Defendant [482] Pigge was not entitled to make the mortgage of the 29th of September 1837 to Veargitt, and that he ought to redeem the same.

[482] CAMPBELL v. CAMPBELL. May 8, 1844.

Executors were directed to apply a competent part of the interest of a fund towards the maintenance and education of the testator's son, during his minority, and accumulate the rest; and, after attaining twenty-one, to apply a moiety of the dividends for his support till he attained twenty-five, and to transfer the fund at twenty-five, with a gift over if he died between twenty-one and twenty-five. The son attained twenty-one between the periods of payment of the half-yearly dividends. Held, that there should be no apportionment, and that he was entitled to the whole half-yearly dividend received after he came of age.

The testator gave his residuary estate to his executors, "upon trust to apply a competent part, at the discretion of his trustees, of the interest and dividends arising therefrom, for or towards the maintenance and education of his son James Campbell, during his minority, and from time to time to accumulate the residue of such interest, &c., and after he should attain twenty-one, to pay and apply a moiety of the last-mentioned interest and dividends, in and for his support, until he attained twenty-five; and after he should have attained twenty-five years, upon trust to pay, transfer, and assign the said residue of his personal estate unto his said son; but in case his said son should attain twenty-one, but should die before he attained twenty-five, leaving children him surviving," then, upon certain trusts, for such children. And in case he should die under twenty-five years without leaving any children, then in trust for the testator's daughters equally.

The testator died in May 1835.

On the 11th of January 1844 £548 was received for a half-year's dividends on a sum of Bank 3 per cents. [483] standing in the name of the Accountant-General, and forming part of the residuary estate of the testator.

The son attained twenty-one on the 31st of October 1843.

This was the petition of James Campbell, praying payment of a moiety of the dividends received since he attained twenty-one, and claiming the whole £548, on the ground of its having been received after he attained twenty-one.

Mr. B. Parry, in support of the petition.

Mr. Kindersley, for the executors, submitted, that, under the 4 & 5 W. 4, c. 22, the Petitioner was only entitled to an apportioned part of the dividends which accrued due in January 1844; for the children of the Petitioner, if they became entitled to the funds, might insist that the Petitioner was only entitled to half of that portion of the dividends which accrued after he attained twenty-one.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I do not think that this is a case for an apportionment of the dividends.

[484] MAN v. RICKETTS. May 30, July 3, 1844.

[[Affirmed, 1 Ph. 617; 41 E. R. 767.]

A suit was instituted by the creditors' and official assignee of a bankrupt. The creditors' assignee died before decree, the official assignee died after decree, and a new official assignee being appointed, his name was, on motion, substituted under the 6 G. 4, c. 16, s. 67, as Plaintiff in the suit.

This bill was filed by James Man, the creditors' assignee, and George Lackington, the official assignee, of a bankrupt. James Man died in March 1842, leaving Lackington surviving him, and a decree was made in the cause on the 22d of February 1844. (Ante, 93.) In March 1844, after the decree had been pronounced, but before it had been entered, Lackington, the official assignee, who was then the sole Plaintiff, died, and on the 2d of April 1844 William Turquand was appointed official assignee in room of Lackington. A motion was now made under the 6 G. 4, c. 16, s. 67, and 1 & 2 W. 4, c. 56, s. 24, that the name of Turquand might be henceforth substituted in the place of Man and Lackington, or of Lackington, in all further proceedings in these causes, in the same manner as if Turquand had been originally a party thereto.

By the sixty-seventh section of the 6 G. 4, c. 16, it is enacted, "That whenever an assignee shall die, or a new assignee or assignees shall be chosen as aforesaid, no action at law or suit in equity shall be thereby abated, but the Court in which any action or suit is depending may, upon the suggestion of such death or removal and new choice, allow the name of the surviving or new assignee or assignees to be substituted in the place of the former; and such action or suit shall be prosecuted in the name or names of the said surviving or new assignee or assignees, in the same manner as if he or they had originally commenced the same."

[485] Mr. Hallett, in support of the motion.

Mr. Kent, contrâ, for the Defendant T. B. Ricketts, objected to the form of the notice of motion, it not stating on whose behalf the motion was made, and contended that this section did not apply to the present case, and that a supplemental bill was necessary.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I think that the Vice-Chancellor of England has made orders of this description, and I will take an opportunity of looking at them.

The Act provides that the estate shall vest in the new assignee, and that the new assignee may be substituted by "suggestion." I should have felt some difficulty as to the proper mode of giving operation to the direction as to the suggestion, but for the orders of the Vice-Chancellor of England.

The unreported cases of Fort v. Weston, Bourne v. Walker, and Nouaille v. Flight, were afterwards referred to (see next page), and on the 3d of July

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS ordered the name of Turquand to be substituted in the place of Lackington deceased as a Plaintiff in the suit; and that the suit should be prosecuted in the same manner as if Lackington had been originally a Plaintiff therein.

[486] Between R. FORT AND H. STRACEY (Assignees of Brickwood), a Bankrupt, Plaintiffs; and JOHN WESTON, Defendant. V.-C. March 14, 1826.

On the 25th of February 1826 Bolland was appointed a new assignee of the bankrupt, in the place of Stracey, who had become bankrupt, since the commencement of the suit. On the motion of Mr. Coombe, it was ordered "That the name of Bolland be substituted in the place of the said Stracey as such assignee as aforesaid. And that this suit be prosecuted in the names of the said Plaintiff Fort and Bolland, in the same manner as if the said Fort and Bolland had originally commenced the same." Reg. [486] BOURNE AND LA MARCHE v. WALKER. V.-C. Nov. 19, 1840.

La Marche, one of the assignees of the bankrupt, had died, and Holderness was appointed assignee in his place. On the motion of

Mr. Cankrien, it was ordered, "That the Plaintiff be at liberty to substitute the name of Holderness, of, &c., in the place of the name of La Marche, lately deceased, as Co-plaintiff in this suit with the above-named Plaintiff Bourne." Reg. Lib. 1840, A. fol. 74.

[486] NOUAILLE v. FLIGHT. M. R. April 26, 1844.

The Plaintiffs Nouaille, Vallé, and Day, together with Gibson, since deceased, and Lackington, as the official assignee of Woodgate, a bankrupt, filed their bill in this Court against the Defendant thereto, and a decree was made therein, and the Master made his report. Further directions were afterwards given. George Lackington had since died, and Patrick Johnson had been duly appointed official assignee in the place and stead of Lackington. On the motion of [487] Mr. Heathfield, and on proof of the several matters,

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] ordered, "That the name of the said Patrick Johnson be substituted in the place of the said George Lackington, deceased, as a Co-plaintiff with the Plaintiffs Nouaille, Vallé, and Day in these suits : and that these suits be prosecuted in the names of the said Plaintiffs Nouaille, Vallé, and Day, and the said Patrick Johnson, in the same manner as if the said Patrick Johnson had been originally a Plaintiff therein. And hereof notice was to be given to the Defendants forthwith."

[487] In re BROMLEY. April 1, 24, 1844.

The taxation of a bill was directed on the terms of paying the amount, £50, into Court; it was taxed at £25. The Court, upon motion, directed payment out of the Court of the fund deposited.

Terms of taxation after the expiration of one month from the delivery of the bill.

Under the Solicitors Act (6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, s. 37), where an application is made to tax a solicitor's bill after the expiration of a month from its delivery, the reference for taxation is to be made "with such directions and subject to such conditions as the Court or Judge making such reference shall think proper."

The application for taxation being made in this case after the expiration of the month, the Master of the Rolls, by an order of the 8th of February 1844, directed the bill of costs, amounting to £51, 19s., to be taxed upon the payment by the applicants of that sum into Court.

The bill was taxed, and £25, 16s. 5d. was found due to the solicitor.

Mr. F. H. Goldsmid now moved, on the part of the client, that the sum of £25, 16s. 5d. might be paid out of Court to the solicitor, and that the remainder might be paid back to the client.

[488] The only question was whether this could be done on motion. (See Heathcote v. Edwards, Jacob, 504; Oliver v. Burt, 1 Beavan, 583; Garratt v. Niblock, 5 Beavan, 143.)

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] took time to consider the case, and under the circumstances, and to save the expence, he made the order. He, however, afterwards observed that he begged it to be understood that this was not to be the general practice.

NOTE.—Payment into Court is not now required at the Rolls, where the application for taxation is after the expiration of a month from the delivery of the bill of costs; but it is ordered, "That no proceedings at law be commenced against the Petitioner pending the reference, but the Petitioner is to procure the Master's report in a month (unless the Master shall certify that further time is necessary to enable him to make his report), or the order is to be of no effect."

[489] MADEN v. VEEVERS. June , July 31, 1844.

A Defendant admitted the possession of documents, but stated that they were all prepared and made since the dispute arose, in contemplation of the litigation of that dispute, and her defence against the Plaintiff's claim: but she did not connect them with her professional advisers. Held, that they were not privileged, and ought to be produced.

A bill was filed, insisting on a partition already made between the Plaintiff and Defendant, who were tenants in common. The bill contained an alternative prayer for a partition under the Court. The Defendant insisted on the invalidity of the partition, but admitted the possession of documents shewing the manner in which she had since dealt with her share of the property. Held, that the Plaintiff had an interest in them, if it were only for the purpose of ascertaining who were tenants in common with him.

The principal facts of this case will be found stated in a former volume (5 Beavan, 503), from which it will appear that the Plaintiffs, the Defendant, and others, had been or were tenants in common of certain lands and coal mines. A partition had been made by agreement between the parties in 1812. The Defendant, Mrs. Veevers, was then under coverture, and had not concurred in any fine so as to bind her estate. The object of the bill was either to establish the partition, or, in the alternative, to effect a partition by means of the usual commission issuing out of this Court.

The Defendant, Mrs. Veevers, by her answer stated, that she had certain deeds and documents mentioned in the schedule, but she said that the same deeds, documents, &c., specified in the first part of the schedule, related exclusively to the title of the Defendant, and of the several parties, thereinbefore mentioned, entitled under the appointment executed by her, and under the will of Sagar Veevers, in and to the several estates, hereditaments, &c., whereto she and such several other parties were respectively entitled; and she submitted she was not bound to produce them, and she said that the several documents, papers, and writings in the second part of the schedule, "related wholly and exclusively to the dispute between the Defendant and the said Com-[490]-plainant, respecting the Defendant's aforesaid title to the said estates, hereditaments, and premises, whereof, wherein, and whereto the Defendant was possessed, interested, and entitled, and that the same and each of the last-mentioned documents, papers, and writings had been, respectively, prepared and made since the said dispute arose, and with a view to, and in contemplation and prospect of the litigation of the said dispute, and of the Defendant's defence against the claim of the said Complainant; wherefore the Defendant submitted and insisted, that she was not bound, and ought not to be required to produce, or deposit, or part with the possession of the several last-mentioned documents, papers, and writings, or any or either of them, and she declined so to do."

A motion was made for the production of these documents.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Rogers, for the Plaintiffs.

Mr. Turner and Mr. Bacon, contrà.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS reserved judgment.

July 31. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. In this case, production is sought for the documents stated in the second part of the schedule to the Defendant's answer; she says, that they relate exclusively to the dispute between her and the Plaintiffs respecting the title to the estate in question, and that they were all prepared and made since the dispute arose, in contemplation of the litigation of that dispute, and her defence against the Plaintiff's claim. If these documents [491] were cases laid before counsel, the statements made by or for her legal advisers, or communications made between her and her solicitor, merely in the relation of solicitor and client, she would be entitled to protection; but that is not said, and the answer does not bring her within the rule.

With regard to the other documents, which shew the manner in which she has dealt with her own share of the property, I am of opinion, that the Plaintiffs, as tenants in common, have an interest in them, if it be only for the purpose of ascertaining who are tenants in common with them.

I am therefore of opinion that the documents mentioned in the schedule must be produced.

[491] In re WATTS. March 23, 1844.

Special direction given on an order for taxation, that if the solicitor should be unable to establish any of the charges by reason of the death of his clerk, or the absence of the books and papers delivered to the client, the Taxing Master should report specifically thereon.

This was a petition for the taxation of five bills of costs. One of the objections was, that the solicitor would be unable to establish some of his charges, in consequence of the death of his clerk, and of the books and papers having been delivered to the Petitioner and to other persons jointly liable who had become bankrupt.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Bagshawe, for the petition.

Mr. Turner and Mr. Elmsley, contra.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS having ordered the taxation, directed, that if the Taxing Master should find, that with respect to any of the items in any of the five bills of costs, Mr. Watts should be unable to establish any of [492] his charges, by reason of the death of Oliver Orlando Scott in the affidavit of Mr. Watts named, or the absence of the books and papers stated in the said affidavit to have been delivered to the Petitioner or the said other bankrupts, the said Taxing Master should report specifically thereon to the Court.

[S. C. 13 L. J. Ch. 319; 8 Jur. 348. Questioned, Parker v. Sowerby, 1853, 22 L. J. Ch. 946; 1 W. R. 404. Doubted, Adams v. Roberts, 1858, 25 Beav. 658.]

Where the only gift to a class consisted of a direction to divide and pay, upon the death of the tenant for life: Held, upon the context, that those only took who survived such tenant for life.

A testator made a direct gift of his real and personal estate to his wife for life, and after her death he directed his executors to sell and "divide and equally pay" the produce amongst a class of children; and in case of the death of any of the children in the lifetime of the wife, leaving issue, he directed his executors to "pay" unto the issue, his parent's share. Held, that those children and issue were alone entitled who survived the tenant for life.

This bill was filed by the three Plaintiffs, on behalf of themselves and all other persons interested in the freehold and copyhold estate of a testator, except the Defendants.

The testator, by his will dated in 1801, gave and bequeathed all his real and personal estate to his wife for her life; and immediately after her decease, he directed his executors to sell his freeholds, &c., and his household furniture, &c., and to call in monies, and invest a sufficient sum in consols to answer three annuities, which annuities, in case of the deaths of the annuitants, were to fall into the residue of his personal estate, and be divided as after mentioned.

The testator proceeded as follows:—"And with respect to the residue of the produce of sale of my said [493] freehold, copyhold, or leasehold estates, household furniture, books, plate, linen, and china, and other household stuff, hereinbefore directed to be sold, and money due upon bonds or otherwise, and other the rest, residue, and remainder of my real and personal estate, I direct my executors to divide and equally pay the same, to and amongst all and every the children born in lawful wedlock of my brothers and sisters, and to and amongst all and every the children born in lawful wedlock of my said dear wife's brothers and sisters, share and share alike. And my further will and meaning is, that in case of the death of any or either of the above-mentioned children in the lifetime of my said dear wife, leaving issue, then and in that case, I hereby direct my said executors, to pay unto the issue of such child or children his, her, or their parents' share equally between them, share and share alike. And my further will and meaning is, that as the several annuitants die, I hereby direct that their said annuities, as they respectively fall into the residue of my personal estate, and the stock wherein they are invested, shall go and be equally divided amongst all and every the children above mentioned, and the issue of such deceased child or children, share and share alike."

The testator died in 1818, at which time all the brothers and sisters both of himself and wife were dead.

His widow died in 1837.

William Wilson, a nephew of the testator, died in his lifetime. Samuel Verry, a nephew of the testator's wife, died in her lifetime without leaving any issue, and Robert Stone, a nephew of the widow, also died in the widow's lifetime.

[494] Mr. Spence and Mr. Wood, for the Plaintiffs.

The life-estate is given to the wife directly, and there is no gift to the trustees until her death. There is no gift whatever to the class, except in the direction to divide and pay, and, therefore, there was no vesting until the period at which the sale, division, and payment were to take place; consequently those only who survived the tenant for life attained vested interests, and became entitled to participate in the fund.

Mr. Turner and Mr. Maxwell, contrà, contended that there was a gift to a class, which vested immediately on the death of the testator, and that the payment alone was postponed for the convenience of the estate. That, therefore, the representatives of those who survived the testator, but died in the lifetime of the widow, were entitled to share in the fund.

The following cases were cited:—Billingsley v. Wills (3 Atk. 219), Viner v. Francis (2 B. C. C. 658, and 2 Cox, 190), Batsford v. Kebbell (3 Ves. 363, 364), Walker v. Main (1 Jac. & W. 1), Leeming v. Sherratt (2 Hare, 14), Gray v. Garman (Ib. 268), Hallifax v. Wilson (16 Ves. 171).

Mr. Stinton, Mr. Elderton, Mr. Shebbeare, Mr. Cory, Mr. Ellis, and Mr. Miller, for other parties.

Mr. Spence, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS reserved judgment.

[495] March 23. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The testator in this will has described a class of children, amongst whom the residuary estate is to be divided, after the death of his wife, to whom he has given his real and personal estate for life. He has made no direct gift to the children, nor to any trustee for them; but he has directed the whole to be sold and "divided and equally paid" amongst the children, &c.

I am of opinion, upon the construction of this will, that the direction to "divide and pay" applies to such persons only as might answer the description at the time of distribution; and that the class to take consists of such children as should be living at the death of the wife, and the issue of any who should die in the lifetime of the wife, leaving issue, such issue being living at the period of distribution.

The effect therefore is, that the children who died in the lifetime of the tenant for life, and their issue who died in the lifetime of the tenant for life, are excluded.

I do not say that in all cases where there is only a direction to "pay" it excludes all those who may not be living at the time of distribution. That must always depend on the context of the will.

DECREE.—Declare, that the residuary estate "was divisible amongst such only of the children of the testator's brothers and sisters, and of his widow's brothers and sisters, and of the issue of any such child deceased in the lifetime of the said testator's widow, as were living at the death of the testator's said widow, such issue taking the share which their parents would have taken if living at the death of the testator's said widow." And that William Wilson, Samuel Verry, and Robert Stone did not respectively become entitled to any share or interest in the said testator's residuary estate.

[See In re Johnson and Weatherall, 1888-90, 37 Ch. D. 439; affirmed in House of Lords, 15 App. Cas. 203.]

Taxation ordered, after payment under protest, the payment being insisted on as a condition for parting with a deed necessary to complete a purchase. A party named trustee without his sanction, and called on to disclaim, is authorised in taking the opinion of counsel as to his obligation to execute a disclaimer. Generally country solicitors are not allowed the costs of a journey to London to examine abstracts there, unless there be some speciality.

This was a petition for the taxation of a bill of costs, which had been paid.

The Petitioners had sold an estate vested in them as trustees, and two terms of years having, on a former purchase, been assigned to Mr. Curling to attend the inheritance, the Petitioners applied to him to reassign them to new trustees for the present purchaser. This he refused to do, alleging that his name had been used without his authority, and that he had never accepted the trusts.

Mr. Curling was thereupon requested to execute a deed of disclaimer; he ultimately consented to do so, upon an undertaking to pay his costs and expenses.

Mr. Tryon, who was residing at Deal, was employed by Mr. Curling as his solicitor on the occasion. He perused the abstract of the different deeds, and also the deed of disclaimer, and he took the opinion of counsel as to Mr. Curling's obligation to execute the deed of disclaimer, and made a journey up to London to compare the deeds with the abstract. In August 1843 he delivered his bill of costs, amounting to £26, 18s., in which he charged £7, 7s. for obtaining counsel's opinion, and £12 for his journey to London and expenses there. The bill having been objected to, Mr. Tryon offered to reduce it by the sum of £5, 5s., but refused to [497] part with the deed of disclaimer until he received payment of the balance.

The deed of disclaimer being necessary for the completion of the purchase, the amount of the bill after deducting the £5, 5s. and making an addition of 13s. 4d. was, on the 23d of November 1843, sent by a clerk to Mr. Tryon's London agents, with a letter, stating that the sum was paid under protest, for the purpose of obtaining the deed, and without prejudice to the Petitioners' right to tax or otherwise question the bill of costs. On the same day, Mr. Tryon's agents wrote to the solicitor of the Petitioners, stating that they had placed the sum of £22, 6s. 4d. to Mr. Tryon's credit with the executors, which, according to his instructions, they had received in satisfaction of his claims, for the purpose of closing this account and avoiding all dispute.

The Petitioners' solicitor, however, immediately returned an answer, stating that the £22, 6s. 4d. was paid upon the terms stated in the letter left, and upon no other; and if they did not think fit to receive it, he offered to return the deed on receiving back the money, and to consider that they refused to deliver up the deed.

In answer to this letter, Mr. Tryon's agents stated that they could not pay back the sum received in exchange for the deed, on its return, as it was useless to Mr. Tryon's client.

A petition was presented, praying the taxation of the bill.

Mr. Roundell Palmer, for the Petitioners, contended that the bill having been paid under protest, ought now [498] to be taxed; that counsel's opinion was unnecessary, not having been taken with a view to assist the execution of the deed, but to determine the propriety of disclaiming a trust of two terms of years which he had refused to accept, and that, in addition to this, Mr. Tryon had been informed that such a course would be objected to as unnecessary. Secondly, that it was not necessary for a solicitor, having an agent in town, to come to London to examine deeds, when that duty might be as well performed by the London agent, or by his clerk, as by the principal. (Crossley v. Parker, 1 Jac. & W. 460; Alsop v. Lord Oxford, 1 Myl. & K. 564; Horlock v. Smith, 2 Myl. & Cr. 523.)

Mr. Rolfe, contra, contended that there ought not to be any taxation of the bill, which had been finally settled. That Mr. Tryon had made the deduction of £5, 5s., and parted with the deed of disclaimer on the terms of receiving the £22, 6s. 4d., and that the account having been thus finally settled by agreement, ought not to be reopened.

He argued also that the items complained of were proper.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale], on the whole, was of opinion that the payment had been conditional, though, if it had been absolute, it might, upon the special circumstances, have still been subject to taxation.

That Mr. Curling's name having been used without his authority, he was justified in taking the opinion of counsel on the matter; but that as to the travelling expenses, the general rule was not to allow such costs [499] unless there were some specialty, and this would have to be considered by the Master on the taxation, which he must direct.

He therefore ordered a taxation of the items complained of, and reserved the question of costs.

NOTE.—The Taxing Master, on taxation, disallowed the charges for the journey, &c., and allowed £2, 2s. only for the examination of the deeds; but he allowed the costs of the opinion, with some deduction. The parties then arranged the matter, and the case was not again brought before the Court.

[499] HUSSEY v. DIVETT. April 23, 1844.

A bill of revivor and supplement was filed to bring new trustees before the Court. It was supplemental as to the trustees, but a bill of revivor as regarded the other Defendants. Held, that it was only necessary to set down the bill to be heard as against the new trustees.

This was a bill of revivor and supplement, to bring new trustees before the Court. It was set down to be heard against the new trustees only, and not as against the other parties, with respect to whom it was simply sought to revive the suit.

Mr. W. H. Clarke, for the Plaintiff.

Mr. Freeling objected, that this suit had been set down against the new trustees only, and that the practice was as stated in 3 Daniell's Practice (page 232): "It is to be recollected, that, in all cases where there is a bill of revivor and supplement, the case must be set down for hearing against all the parties, although the bill is only a bill of revivor against one, and an order to revive has been obtained."

[500] A MSS. case, of Nellthorpe v. Marriott, was referred to.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS thought that no general rule could be laid down, and that each case must depend on its particular circumstances. However, as it was admitted that this bill contained no new facts connected with the parties against whom it was sought simply to revive the suit, and as its purport was limited to the bringing the new trustees before the Court, the objection could not be sustained.

[500] SMART v. BRADSTOCK. July 18, 1844.

Twenty years ago, twenty-seven persons conveyed real and personal estate to trustees to sell, and to divide the produce. Held, that a bill might be filed by a few, on behalf, &c., against the trustees, to make them account; and that it was not necessary to make all the persons interested parties to the suit.

This bill was filed by the three Plaintiffs, "on behalf of themselves and all other the persons interested in the real and personal estates of Walter Woodcock," and the produce of such estates, under two indentures dated in 1824 and 1826.

Disputes having arisen between the parties entitled under the will of Walter Woodcock, such parties (being twenty-seven in number) executed the deeds in question, whereby they conveyed the real and personal estate to trustees, on trust to sell, and to divide the produce between the parties beneficially interested. This bill was filed to make the trustees account.

Mr. Bevir, for the Defendant Bradstock, objected, that the suit was defective for want of parties, and he insisted that all the persons beneficially interested under the deeds stated, ought to be made parties, to protect their interests. That there was no allegation in the bill [501] that the persons interested were so numerous that it would be impossible to make them parties to the suit; and in a case before Vice-Chancellor Wigram (Harrison v. Stewardson, 2 Hare, 530) it was considered that twenty creditors, interested in a real estate, were not so large a number, that the Court would, on the ground of inconvenience alone, allow a few of them to represent the others, and dispense with such others as parties in a suit to recover the estate against the whole body of creditors.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Shapter, for another Defendant.

Mr. Turner and Mr. Bird, for the Plaintiffs.

Where parties are numerous, the Court will not require the presence of all of them, if it sees that they are substantially represented by other parties to the suit, whose interests are not conflicting. It is always a matter of convenience, and to hold the contrary would result in a denial of justice; Harvey v. Harvey (4 Beav. 215).

In the case of a joint stock company, the Court allows a few on behalf of the rest; Taylor v. Salmon (4 Myl. & Cr. 134); and the reasoning in that case is equally applicable to the present. (See Richardson v. Hastings, ante, 301, 323; Powell v. Wright, ante, 444; Gordon v. Pym, 3 Hare, 223.)

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I must hold that the absent parties are sufficiently represented: they have exactly the same interests as those of the Plaintiffs. The parties were twenty-seven in number twenty years ago; there is no telling what number they may amount to at the present time, and the justice of the case would probably be defeated, if the Plaintiffs were required to make them all parties to the suit.

[502] LECKIE v. HOG BEN. July 22, 1844.

A testatrix, being liable to pay an annuity to A. for life, purchased an annuity during B.'s life, and effected a policy on B.'s life for £2000. By her will she recited, that on the death of B. £2000 would be recovered to her estate. In the event of B. dying in the life of A., the executors were to provide A.'s annuity out of her estate. In the event of A.'s death before B., she gave the purchased annuity to C., he paying the premiums; and on the death of B. she gave to C. the £2000. B. died in the life of A. Held, that C. was not entitled to the £2000.

The testatrix, being under an obligation to secure an annuity of £200 a year to her brother Remington Leckie for life, purchased an annuity of that amount, payable during the life of Fanny Burgess, whose life she insured for the sum of £2000. The testatrix being also bound to pay an annuity of £150 to Mrs. Gill for life, purchased a leasehold property for securing it.

The testatrix had a power of appointing certain property standing in the names of trustees; and by her will, after giving certain legacies, she gave the interest of the remaining sums referred to in her marriage settlement, to her husband for life, and on his death she gave half of the residue to James Henry Leckie, and the other moiety to Mrs. Robinson and her children.

By a codicil, dated in September 1835, she expressed herself as follows:—
"Whereas I am bound to pay my brother Remington Leckie an annuity of £200 sterling per annum during natural life, for which purpose I have purchased an annuity on and during the life of Mrs. Fanny Burgess, on whose life I pay annually the sum of £80, 16s. 3d. to the West of England Life Assurance Office, in order that, at her death, the sum of £2000, or more, may be recovered to my estate; in the event of Mrs. Fanny Burgess dying before my brother Remington Leckie, I leave it to the discretion of my executors to provide my said brother Remington Leckie his annuity from my estate, as they shall think best. In the event of my brother Remington's death before the above-named Mrs. Fanny Burgess, I give and bequeath [503] the above annuity of £200 per annum unto my brother Captain James Henry Leckie, his heirs, administrators, and assigns, he or they paying the life assurance of £80, 16s. 3d.; and on the death of Mrs. Fanny Burgess, I give and bequeath the above-named £2000 insured upon her life unto my said brother Captain James Henry Leckie, his heirs, administrators, and assigns." The codicil also contained the following disposition, which was supposed to affect the construction of the prior gift.

"I am also bound to pay Mrs. Jane Ann Gill an annuity of £150 during her natural life, for which purpose I purchased a leasehold estate of some houses in Johnson's Court and St. Dunstan's Court, Fleet Street. On the death of the said Mrs. Jane Ann Gill, I give and bequeath unto my niece Mrs. Ann Robinson, &c., the above leasehold estate. I desire my executors to pay my brother R. Leckie the sum of £752, 0s. 3d. After paying this, and the annual assurance of £80, 16s. 3d. on the life of Mrs. Fanny Burgess, and any deficiency in the annuity for Mrs. Jane Ann Gill, I give and bequeath unto my husband John Penny, for his natural life, the interest of all my other property that now is or may come into my estate after my death. At his death, I give and bequeath one-half of the residue of the said property unto my brother Captain James Henry Leckie, the interest of the other half of the said property unto my niece Ann Robinson, &c., for her natural life. At her death I wish it to be divided among her children, on their becoming of age, viz., twenty-one years."

The testatrix died in 1838.

Fanny Burgess died in 1842, leaving Remington Leckie her surviving. The Plaintiff James Henry Leckie [504] claimed the £2000 which on the death of Fanny Burgess had been paid on the policy; and the question was, whether, under the codicil, he was so entitled, or whether the sum in question fell into the testatrix's residuary estate.

Mr. Purvis and Mr. Wood, for the Plaintiff, contended, that on the death of Mrs. Fanny Burgess, the Plaintiff, in any event, became entitled to the policy. That the testatrix provided for the two alternatives, namely, of Mrs. Burgess dying in the lifetime of Remington, and Remington dying in the life of Mrs. Burgess; in the former, Remington's annuity was to be provided out of the estate; and in the latter, Mrs. Burgess's annuity was to go to the Plaintiff; and that then the testatrix thus proceeded: "And on the death of Mrs. Fanny Burgess" (meaning whenever it might happen), "I give and bequeath the £2000 insured upon her life unto my brother James."

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Freeling, and Mr. Turner and Mr. Busk, contra. The contingency on which the policy was given to the Plaintiff has not happened. The gift of it was only to take effect in the event of Remington dying in the life of Mrs. Burgess. The latter words, "and on the death," &c., are qualified by those immediately preceding, and they together form one sentence. The contingency extends to the whole limitation (1 Jarman on Wills, 753), otherwise the copulative "and" will, unnecessarily, be rejected. The £2000 therefore forms part of the residue.

Mr. Randell, for the executors.

Mr. Purvis, in reply.

[505] THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The testatrix recites, that at the death of Mrs. Fanny Burgess the sum of £2000 or more may be recovered "to her estate;" and in the event of Mrs. Fanny Burgess dying before Remington Leckie, she left it to the discretion of her executors to provide Remington his annuity from "her estate" as they should think best. So that, the £2000 being recovered "to her estate," her executors were from "her estate" to provide for the annuity.

She then begins a fresh paragraph. In the event of Remington's death before Mrs. Fanny Burgess, she gives the annuity to James Leckie, he paying the assurance on Mrs. Fanny Burgess's life, and on the death of Mrs. Fanny Burgess she gives the policy to James H. Leckie.

R. II.—37*

There are two alternative events contemplated; Mrs. Burgess dying in the life of Remington, and Remington dying in the life of Mrs. Burgess. In the former, she or her estate will receive £2000, and be still liable to pay Remington's annuity: she therefore says the £2000 will "come to her estate;" and out of that estate she directs Remington's annuity to be provided for. In the other event, Remington's annuity ceases, but her estate remains entitled to the annuity of £200 during Mrs. Burgess's life, and to the policy payable on her death. The testatrix says, in that event, let my brother James have the annuity, he keeping up the policy, and, on the determination of the annuity by the death of Mrs. Burgess, let him have the £2000 payable on the policy.

In one event, the money payable on the annuity was to fall into her estate, and contribute to pay the continuing annuity to her brother. In the other event, James was to have the annuity payable by Mrs. Burgess during its continuance, he keeping up the policy on her life; and on her death, he was to have the money payable on the policy.

I am of opinion, that in the events which have happened, the Plaintiff is not entitled to the £2000.

A purchaser being a creditor of the agent of the vendor of an estate, is not entitled, by agreement with the agent alone, to place the debt due to the agent to the debit of the principal on account of the purchase-money.

A. employed B. to sell his estate, and receive the purchase-money. B. sold it to C. An account was afterwards settled between B. and C., whereby, after giving credit for monies paid on account of the purchase, and a private debt of £550 due from B. to C., a small balance appeared due on account of the purchase-money, which C. then paid to B. A. afterwards, in ignorance of the arrangements between B. and C. executed the conveyance, and signed a receipt for the whole purchase-money, which were handed over by B. to C. Held, that the arrangement for setting off B.'s private debt was invalid, and that C. was still liable to A. for the £550.

The Plaintiff Young was entitled to the Radnage estate, subject to a mortgage to Mr. Eeles for £700, and also subject to a mortgage for £200 to Mr. Rumsey the solicitor of Young, which latter, although alleged to have been paid, still remained untransferred.

On the 11th of November 1840 Rumsey, with the authority of Young, entered into a written contract for the sale of the estate to the Defendant White for £920, to be completed on or before the 25th of March then next, on which day the purchase-money was made payable. On the same day, Rumsey obtained payment from White (professedly on account of the purchase-money), of two sums, of £300 and £35.

[507] It appeared that in September 1839 and July 1840, White had, previously, advanced to Rumsey two sums, of £400 and £150, which, though disputed, the Court, upon the evidence in the causes, held to be the private debt of Rumsey.

Rumsey acted as solicitor for both vendor and purchaser in the sale.

On the 26th of March 1841 Rumsey made out two accounts, one of which he produced to White, and was headed "Mr. White in account with Mr. Rumsey," and therein, after charging White with the purchase-money of £920, and giving credit for the debts of £400 and £150, and the two sums of £300 and £35 advanced at the date of the contract, and interest, it appeared, that £3, 14s. 6d. remained due from White on account of his purchase. White thereupon paid this balance to Rumsey. The conveyance of the estate had not, at that time, been executed.

On the same day (26th of March 1841) Rumsey wrote to Young, stating the net balance payable to him out of the £920 purchase-money to be £123, after paying Eeles's mortgage, amounting to £770, and Rumsey's bill of costs in the transaction, amounting to £27. He also stated, that if he (Young) would return the conveyance executed, "giving him (Rumsey) directions how he would have the balance disposed of, he, Rumsey, would pay it." He enclosed the account, and the bill of costs, in which he charged for the reconveyance of Eeles's mortgage. The Plaintiff thereupon executed a common conveyance of the estate from himself to White, and he signed a receipt, endorsed thereon, for the whole consideration money, and returned it to Rumsey.

[508] Eeles's mortgage had never been paid off or reconveyed.

On the 10th of April 1841 Rumsey sent the deed to White, and a few days after he absconded, and was subsequently made bankrupt. No notice had been taken of Eeles's mortgage, which still remained wholly unpaid.

Young filed this bill against White, praying payment of £620, the alleged balance of the purchase-money, and offering to satisfy Eeles's mortgage.

On the other hand, White filed a cross-bill, insisting that the £400, £150, and £35 had been advanced to Rumsey for and as the agent of Young, and that the whole purchase-money had been paid, and praying an effective conveyance of the property, free from the incumbrances of Eeles and Rumsey.

Mr. Tinney and Mr. R. Palmer, for the Plaintiff Young, contended, that of the purchase-money, £300 alone had been paid by the Defendant, and that the sums of £400 and £150 advanced before the contract, constituted a private debt of Rumsey, which he could not concur in setting off against the sum due to his principal; Wyatt v. Lord Hertford (3 East. 147). That even if these sums constituted a debt of Young, they could not be set off against his lien for the purchase-money; Pinnock v. Harrison (3 Mee. & W. 532).

That if the money had not been actually paid, the receipt was ineffectual; Coppin v. Coppin (2 P. Wms. 294); and no money had been advanced on the faith of the conveyance and receipt.

[509] Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Parry, for the Defendant White, contended, that Rumsey had all along acted as the general agent of Young, and that all the sums had been advanced to Rumsey on account of Young, either as his authorised agent, or on account of the purchase. That, by the execution of the conveyance, and by signing the receipt, Young had recognized all that had been done by his agent, and the mode in which the accounts had been settled.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS reserved his judgment.

July 15. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I have read the papers in this case, and the outline of it seems to be as follows:—

Mr. Young employed Rumsey, who had been his attorney and agent in many other matters, as his agent, to sell the Radnage estate, and to receive the purchase-money.

Rumsey agreed to sell the estate to Mr. White for £920, to be paid on the completion of the purchase.

The estate was subject to incumbrances, and at the date of the agreement, Rumsey was indebted to Mr. White in the sum of £550.

In the agreement, no notice was taken of the incumbrances, or of the debt which was due from Rumsey to White; but it was provided, that the estate was to be conveyed to Mr. White, free from incumbrances, for the sum of £920, to be paid at a future time.

[510] Rumsey, however, requested Mr. White to advance £300, part of the purchase-money, immediately, for the use of Mr. Young; and the request being complied with, Rumsey signed a receipt for the same, as part of the consideration money; and in the receipt no notice was taken of the debt which was owing from Rumsey to Mr. White.

I am of opinion that, as the matter stood immediately after the receipt was signed, it cannot be considered that more than £300 had then been paid on account of the purchase-money.

Almost immediately afterwards, Rumsey requested Mr. White to advance a further sum of £35 for the use of Mr. Young. The evidence shews a great probability that this sum of £35 was paid; and although the proof is not conclusive, yet, as Mr. Young has declined to take an inquiry on the subject, I must consider that the sum of £35 was in fact paid, and I think that it ought to be attributed to the purchase. The question is, what, if any, further sum of money was paid by Mr. White to Rumsey pursuant to the contract.

After the contract had been signed, Rumsey, who was then acting as solicitor for Mr. White as well as for Mr. Young, prepared the conveyance (under the circumstances, a very improper one), and on the 26th of March 1841 he told Mr. Young that the purchase-money was paid.

In the absence of all evidence to the contrary, I think that Mr. Young must have understood Rumsey to say, that the purchase-money was paid pursuant to the contract.

[511] On the same day (March 26th) Rumsey settled an account with Mr. White in relation to the purchase. The account is stated in the name of Rumsey, and not in the name of Mr. Young; but it appears to be the only account which Mr. White had in relation to his purchase from Mr. Young: and in this account Rumsey gave credit to Mr. White for sums amounting to £550, the debt then due from Rumsey himself, and some interest thereon; and upon this account, with such credit, he made it appear that no more than £3, 14s. 6d., remained due to Mr. Young on account of the purchase-money; and Mr. White paid this sum of £3, 14s. 6d. to Rumsey for Mr. Young.

Mr. White seems to have placed so much confidence in Rumsey, as to believe that Rumsey had borrowed the sums amounting to £550 for the use of Mr. Young, that the estate was free from incumbrances, and that Mr. Young had authorized Rumsey to set off the debt against so much of the purchase-money.

On the same day on which Rumsey settled this account with Mr. White, he sent to Mr. Young a statement of account, falsely representing, in effect, that he had received the whole of the purchase-money, and that after applying a part of it in discharge of Eeles's mortgage, and another part in paying his own bill of costs, a balance of £123, remained in his hands, to be applied for the benefit of Mr. Young.

Mr. Young placed so much confidence in Rumsey, as to believe this statement to be true; and he thereupon, at the request of Mr. Rumsey, executed the conveyance which Rumsey had prepared, and signed a receipt for the whole of the purchase-money.

[512] The conveyance and receipt were sent to Rumsey by his clerk, and delivered to Mr. White on the 10th of April 1841.

No money was paid or advanced on the credit of the conveyance and receipt; and no more than £335, and the balance of £3, 14s. 6d., can be considered as paid on account of the purchase-money pursuant to the contract. The question therefore seems to be reduced to this:—

Whether a purchaser, being a creditor of the agent of the vendor of an estate, and dealing with the agent in the absence of his principal, and without any special authority of the principal for the purpose, is entitled, as against the principal, by agreement with the agent alone, to place his debt, really due from the same agent, to the debit of the principal, on account of the purchase-money?

I am of opinion that the purchaser is not so entitled; and consequently that Mr. White is still indebted to Mr. Young for so much of the purchase-money as remains, after deducting the three sums of £300, £35, and £3, 14s. 6d.

On the other hand, Mr. Young is bound to perform his part of the contract, and, at his own charge, to procure for Mr. White an assignment or surrender of the term vested in Mr. Eeles, and a reconveyance of the estate which was vested in Rumsey.

I think that the costs of the suit must follow the event, and I greatly regret the additional burden thus thrown on Mr. White.

[513] His loss has arisen from a shameful fraud practised upon him, and he is himself free from the slightest personal imputation.

[513] STAGG v. BROWN. July 24, 1844.

Upon a motion, made on the last seal after Trinity term, for an order absolute to dissolve the common injunction, the Plaintiff will not be allowed until the next motion day to shew cause on the merits; but the Court will appoint an early day in the Vacation for that purpose.

This being the last seal after Trinity term,

Mr. Bird moved for the order absolute, dissolving the common injunction. He observed, that the Plaintiff was not entitled to have until the next motion day (Michaelmas term) to shew cause on the merits. He therefore asked that an early day might be appointed to shew cause. Robinson v. Walcott (5 Ves. 551).

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. Such has always been the practice. I appoint this day week for shewing cause.

See Rew v. Dixon, 2 Mad. 258; Fielding v. Capes, 4 Mad. 393; Lane v. Barton, 1 Phil. 363; and Bordinave v. Wadeson, 1 Colly. 432.

[514] BLAKE v. BLAKE. July 30, 1844.

An order of course alleged to have been irregularly obtained, cannot be treated as a nullity. It operates, until, by a proper application, it is discharged.

The answer was filed on the 7th of March, and no exceptions were taken. On the 6th of July the Defendant gave notice to dismiss the bill for want of prosecution. Before the motion came on, and on the 20th of July, the Plaintiff obtained an order of course to amend his bill.

Mr. Lovat contended, that the order to amend, having been obtained after the time allowed by orders of the Court, must be treated as a nullity; and at all events, that the Defendant was entitled to the costs of the motion. Davenport v. Manners (2 Sim. 514), Swinfen v. Swinfen (3 Sim. 384), Peacock v. Sievier (5 Sim. 553), were cited.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. The motion to dismiss being intercepted by the order to amend, the order to dismiss cannot be made, but the Plaintiff must pay the costs of the motion.

I should feel great difficulty in treating the order to amend as a nullity. It may or may not be regular, but it must remain in operation until, upon a proper application, it is discharged.

[515] HEMING v. ARCHER. July 26, 1844.

[S. C. 8 Beav. 294; 9 Beav. 366.]

The 1 W. 4, c. 47, s. 12, does not apply to a case where an estate is devised to a trustee during the life of a cestui que trust, with remainders over; and by the disclaimer of the trustee, the legal estate descends on the heir.

The testator, by his will, dated in 1837, devised a real estate, called Eaton Hills, unto and to the use of Thomas Moore and his heirs, during the life of his (the testator's) wife, or until she should marry again, and during the life of his son Joseph Archer, or until his son should become bankrupt or insolvent, or attempt to dispose of, by way of anticipation, the rents and profits of the said premises, or any part thereof, upon certain trusts therein mentioned, for the benefit of his said wife, and after the decease or second marriage of his wife, upon certain trusts for the benefit of his son Joseph. After the decease, bankruptcy, or insolvency of his said son, or any attempt by him to dispose of, by way of anticipation, the said rents and profits, or any part thereof, whichever should first happen, the testator devised the property, unto and to the use of all and every the child and children of his said son, in equal shares, and the heirs of their respective bodies, as tenants in common, with certain remainders over. The will contained other similar devises of other parts of the testator's property.

After the testator's death, a creditor's suit was instituted, in which the real estate had been directed to be sold for payment of the testator's debt. Thomas Moore, by his answer, disclaimed all interest under the will, and was dismissed. The widow died pending the suit. The testator's son Joseph was living, and had four infant children. The estate had been sold under the decree, and a petition was now presented under the 1 W. 4, c. 47, for the purpose of obtaining a conveyance of the [516] fee-simple, from the equitable tenant for life, or Francis Charles Archer, the heir at law, in whom, by the disclaimer, it was said the legal estate had vested.

By the twelfth section of this Act it is provided, that where any lands, &c., shall be devised by any person whose estate is liable to his debts, and "by such devise shall be vested in any person or persons for life," with any remainder over which may not be vested, &c., and a decree shall be made for payment of such debts, the Court may direct "any such tenant for life" to convey the fee-simple to the purchaser.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. W. T. S. Daniel, in support of the petition.

Mr. Turner, contra. The Act has reference to the case of the legal estate vesting by devise in one for life; here the heir takes by descent and not devise, and the Act is inapplicable.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS was of opinion that the Act did not apply to the present case, where there was a mere equitable estate for life, and where the legal estate had devolved on the heir, not by devise, but by descent.

NOTE.—The case was reargued, and on the 27th of February 1845 the Master of the Rolls came to the same conclusion, see post [8 Beav. 294]. The Lord Chancellor, on appeal, concurred in the opinion of the Master of the Rolls, 30th of May 1845.

[517] HARVEY v. MOUNT. June 10, 12, July 31, 1844.

Though it is the more usual and regular course to file articles or objections to the credit of a witness, previous to applying for leave to exhibit interrogatories for the examination of witnesses in support of such articles, still a simultaneous motion for leave to file articles, and exhibit the interrogatories, is not irregular.

Previous to a cause being at issue, the Plaintiff's solicitor prevailed on A. B. to make a voluntary affidavit, not required by the proceedings in the cause. A. B. was afterwards examined as a witness on behalf of the Defendant, and was cross-examined by the Plaintiff; her affidavit and depositions were contradictory, but the affidavit was not produced to her at the time of her examination. Upon an application by the Plaintiff to file articles and examine witnesses to discredit A. B.: Held, that though the conduct of the Plaintiff's solicitor had been highly improper, still the motion ought to be granted, leave being given to the Defendant to examine witnesses to support her credit, and as to the circumstances under which the affidavit had been sworn.

This was a motion made by the Plaintiff, for leave to file articles against the credit of Charlotte Sangwell, a witness examined on behalf of the Defendant, and to exhibit interrogatories for the examination of witnesses in support of such articles.

At an early period of the cause, and long before she was or could be examined as a witness, the solicitor of the Plaintiff prevailed upon her to make an affidavit of certain facts alleged to be material to the cause. This affidavit was purely voluntary, and was not required for any proceeding in the cause. Before the time when she was examined as a witness, the Plaintiff's solicitor was aware that her testimony would probably differ from the statements in her affidavit. The Plaintiff refrained from examining her in chief, but she was produced as a witness for the Defendant, and was cross-examined by the Plaintiff. At the time of her examination, the affidavit which she had sworn was not produced to her, but she recollected and spoke of her having made an affidavit relating to some of the matters in question. After publication, it appeared that her depositions did not accord with her affidavit, in circumstances stated to be material.

[518] Under these circumstances the present motion was made.

Mr. Turner and Mr. Goodeve, in support of the motion.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. E. F. Smith, contra, contended, that the motion was irregular; First, because, according to the established practice, the Plaintiff ought to have exhibited articles to discredit the witness previous to his making this application, in order that the Defendant might have notice of the grounds of objection to his witness. 2 Daniell's Pr. (page 594), Hinde's Pr. (pages 374, 377), Lord Clarendon's Orders (Beames' Ord. 187, and 1 Sanders' Ord. 302).

Secondly, because the affidavit itself ought to have been produced to the witness at the time of her examination, in order that she might have an opportunity of explaining it. Phil. on Ev. (8th ed. p. 925, 929).

And thirdly, because voluntary affidavits being prohibited by the 5 & 6 W. 4, c. 62, s. 13, the proceeding was illegal; Regina v. Nott (Q. B. Trin. 1843); and because it was also highly improper for the Plaintiff's solicitor to attempt to fix the witness to a particular statement, so as to prevent her being free and unfettered, when she afterwards came to be examined by the proper officer of the Court. They insisted that the Plaintiff ought not to be permitted to avail himself of the affidavit thus improperly obtained.

[519] Wood v. Hammerton (9 Ves. 145), Purcell v. M'Namara (8 Ves. 324), White v. Fussell (19 Ves. 127), and Piggott v. Croxhall (1 Sim. & S. 467), were also cited.

July 31. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The motion was objected to on three grounds:—First. For irregularity, because the motion is made for leave to exhibit interrogatories before any articles or objections to the credit of the witness have been filed.

Secondly, because the Plaintiff's solicitor did not, as it is alleged he ought to have done, cause the affidavit to be produced to the witness at the time she was under examination.

Thirdly, because the Plaintiff ought not to be allowed to found any proceeding on the affidavit, or to use the affidavit for any purpose whatever, inasmuch as it was a highly improper act, and even a legal offence, to procure that affidavit to be sworn.

As to the first objection, it appears to me that, on such a proceeding as this, the more usual and regular proceeding is, first, to file the articles or objections to the credit of the witness, and then to apply to the Court for leave to file the interrogatories; but the order for leave to examine witnesses to the credit of other witnesses has not been uniform; it has sometimes been granted on an allegation that the articles had been exhibited, sometimes on articles to be exhibited; and in the cases of Purcell v. M'Namara (8 Ves. 324) and Wood v. Hammerton (9 Ves. 145), [520] Lord Eldon appears to have made orders that the party applying should have leave to file articles, and to exhibit interrogatories in support of them. I cannot consider a motion, which, in its form, is so sanctioned by the authority of Lord Eldon, to be irregular.

As to the second objection, although, if the witness had been orally and publicly examined, the affidavit ought to have been produced to her, yet, having regard to the mode of examination in this Court, I cannot consider it to be an objection to this application that the Plaintiff did not cause the affidavit to be produced to her, and did not cross-examine her on the subject of it.

I have had much more doubt upon the third objection. I think that the conduct of the Plaintiff's solicitor in procuring the witness to swear the affidavit was highly improper; it seems like an attempt to entangle the conscience of the witness, and to fix her to the impression she might have at the time, and upon which the solicitor himself might have had considerable influence, and prevent her from speaking the truth, if it differed from that impression, when she came to be properly and regularly examined, in circumstances free from all influence. Considering the circumstances under which the affidavit was made, it may well be doubted whether, after the establishment of a variance between the statements which the affidavit contains, and the statements contained in the depositions, there may not be a much greater probability in favour of the truth of the depositions. Nevertheless, I think that the fact of difference ought to be brought before the Court for consideration at the hearing; and for that purpose, that I ought to grant this motion, giving leave to the Plaintiff to examine witnesses as to the credit of Charlotte Sangwell, and as to the fact of her having sworn the affidavit; and I think that I [521] ought, at the same time, to give leave to the Defendant to examine witnesses to support her credit, and as to the circumstances under which the affidavit was sworn, but neither party is to examine any witnesses as to any fact which is material to what is in issue in the cause.

A lessee covenanted to build thirty-four additional houses on the demised property within five years, to keep in repair the houses built and to be built, and at the end of the term to deliver them up to the lessor; and there was a proviso for re-entry on non-performance of the covenants. The additional houses were not built, but for forty-six years the lessor received the rent, and thus waived the obligation to build. The leasehold interest being sold; Held, first, that the covenant to deliver up extended to the additional houses, as well as to the houses built at the date of the demise; secondly, that the title was bad, notwithstanding the purchaser might retain possession until the last day of the term, and then escape liability by transferring that day to a pauper; and thirdly, that the purchaser was not bound to accept either a compensation or indemnity.

This case came on upon exceptions to the Master's report in favour of the Plaintiffs' title to the leasehold estate, which the Defendant had agreed to purchase. The bill was filed for the specific performance of this agreement, and the circumstances which gave rise to the suit were as follows:—

In April 1789 Lewis Preston agreed with Temple West, to take a lease or leases of the land in question for ninety-two years and three quarters, from Christmas 1789, for the purpose of building thereon fifty messuages or dwelling-houses.

An indenture of lease, dated the 20th of June 1792, was executed by and between Temple West of the one part, and Lewis Preston of the other part, and thereby, after reciting the agreement of April 1789; and that Lewis Preston, pursuant to his agreement had built sixteen, part of the fifty dwelling-houses, and was desirous [522] that a proper lease should be granted of the ground with the new buildings thereon: it was witnessed, that in consideration of the expense which Lewis Preston had been at in erecting the buildings then built on part of the said ground, and also in consideration of the expense which he would be at, in erecting thirty-four additional dwelling-houses on other part of the same piece of ground, and in consideration of the rents and covenants therein contained, the said Temple West demised to Preston, all the piece of ground therein described, together with the dwelling-houses built and to be built thereon: to hold the same for eighty-nine years and a half, from Lady Day then last, yielding the rents therein mentioned, which Preston covenanted to pay.

Preston, amongst other things, covenanted, that he would, within the first five years of the term, build and finish thirty-four additional dwelling-houses, to make fifty in the whole, he having already built sixteen conformable to the design therein referred to; and also that he would, during the term, well and sufficiently repair the houses then standing upon the ground, or thereafter to be erected thereon with their appurtenances, and all walls and buildings with the appurtenances; and all the premises thereby demised, so well and sufficiently repaired, would, at the end or other sooner determination of the term, peaceably and quietly deliver up to Temple West or his representative.

The lease contained a clause, enabling Temple West to re-enter on the demised premises, in case Lewis Preston should do, or omit to do any act in breach, or non-performance of all or any of his covenants.

The Plaintiffs became entitled to the leasehold interest, as assignees of Children and Woodgate, who [523] became bankrupt in the year 1815, and were themselves entitled as mortgagees with a foreclosed equity of redemption, to such estate as had belonged to Lewis Preston, against whose representative the decree of foreclosure had been obtained and made absolute.

Twenty of the thirty-four additional houses had never been built, but the lessor had continued in the receipt of the rent.

In 1840 the Plaintiffs put up the property for sale by auction, and by the sixth condition of sale it was provided, that the receipt for the ground rent due on the last day of payment for the same, as reserved by the original lease, should be considered as a waiver of any forfeiture of such lease. The Defendant Flight became the purchaser at the sale.

This bill having been filed for the specific performance of the contract, the usual reference as to title was made to the Master.

The Master, by his report, found, that all thirty-four additional houses mentioned in the lease had not been built pursuant to the covenant. That the Defendant had insisted, that the covenant to deliver up thirty-four additional houses, to be built according to the covenant, was an objection to the title; but that the sixth condition of sale having provided, that the receipt for the ground rent, due on the last day of payment for the same as reserved by the original lease, should be considered as a waiver of any forfeiture of such lease, and having regard to the length of time which has elapsed since the date of the lease, without any advantage having been taken on account of the breach of such covenant, and of the Plaintiffs being assignees, under a title ac-[524]-quired subsequent to the expiration of the period limited by the covenant for building the additional houses, the Master stated his opinion to be, that the objection was not a valid objection to the title, and he found in favour of the title.

To this report the Defendant took exceptions, which now came on to be heard.

Mr. Turner and Mr. Rogers, in support of the exceptions. These covenants run with the land, and are binding upon the assignees of the term, Sampson v. Easterby (9 B. & C. 505); and although the covenant to build within the five years may have been waived by the subsequent receipt of rent, still the covenants to keep the whole fifty houses in repair, and to deliver them up at the end of the term, are still subsisting. The covenants are in their nature continuous and cannot, by the receipt of rent, be permanently waived. The lessor still remains entitled to all his remedies against the lessee and the assignees of the term under the covenants.

The title is therefore bad. The purchaser is not bound to accept an indemnity, and as to compensation the amount cannot be ascertained; for, until the expiration of the lease, the extent of the lessee's liability cannot be ascertained.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Heathfield, contra. The covenant to build the thirty-four additional houses ought to have been performed previous to Lady Day 1797, and since that time, the landlord has continued in the receipt of the rent, and has thereby waived the covenant. This covenant was not continuous, and the principal [525] part of the obligation being waived, the accessory, namely, to keep these houses in repair, is waived also. It would be absurd to hold that the lessee is absolved from the obligation to build the twenty houses, and yet liable to keep those non-existing houses in repair, and deliver them over at the end of the term. The covenant to repair and deliver over at the end of the term, therefore, applies only to the houses already built.

Secondly, if there be any liability, the purchaser may, immediately before the expiration of the term, assign it to a pauper and thus relieve himself therefrom. Rowley v. Adams (4 Mylne & Craig, 534). Again, the Plaintiffs having entered into no covenant to indemnify will require none from the purchaser.

Thirdly, no forfeiture or liability can accrue till the end of the lease, when the purchaser will have had the enjoyment of the property for the whole term, with the exception of the last day, which he may assign and thus get rid of all liability on the covenant. Earl of Derby v. Taylor (1 East, 503).

July 31. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The covenant in question consists of three parts—1st, that the lessee will build thirty-four additional houses within five years; 2dly, that he will keep the premises in repair; and 3dly, that at the end of the term, he will deliver up the houses then built, or thereafter to be built, in good and sufficient repair. The covenant to build thirty-four additional houses in five years was broken; the lessor might have re-entered for the breach, but did not, and continued to receive rent from the [526] lessee. The Master has not stated his opinion, whether the covenant to deliver up the houses covenanted to be built is or is not in force; but has merely stated his opinion, that because the lessor did not take advantage of the breach of covenant to build in five years, and the Plaintiffs are assignees, and acquired their title subsequently, the covenant to deliver up, at the end of the term, the houses stipulated to be built, was not an objection to the title.

It was argued at the Bar—first, that the covenant only affects the houses actually built at the time of the demise, and not the houses then only covenanted to be built, and that the only obligation is, to deliver up in repair the houses which shall actually be then built; secondly, that if the covenant be of any validity, the purchaser may relieve himself from it by assigning the lease to a pauper; and thirdly, that supposing the covenant to be in force, nothing is to be done upon it till the end of the term, after the purchaser shall have held the land during the whole term, and had the full enjoyment of it; and, therefore, that the covenant cannot be an objection to the title.

Having carefully read the deed, I am of opinion, notwithstanding some ambiguities of expression, that the covenant extends to the thirty-four additional houses which were to be built, as well as to the sixteen houses which were built at the date of the demise; and that it cannot be confined to such houses only as shall actually be found upon the land at the end of the term.

As to the second point, if it requires any argument, it may be found in this, that the purchaser ought not to be forced to adopt any such expedient, and that he has a right to the enjoyment of the land during the whole [527] term, and to be exempt from any obligation or inducement, imposed upon him by the state of the title or property, to assign the smallest part of the term, for the purpose of relieving himself from any responsibility.

Upon the third point, the question is, whether a liability of this sort can be the subject of compensation. An indemnity the purchaser would not be bound to take, if in such a case it could be given, and I am of opinion, that such a liability as this is not a fit subject for either compensation or indemnity. It is, I conceive, impossible to ascertain, with any reasonable accuracy, the amount or value of any such liability, and it cannot be said, that a purchaser of a leasehold estate enjoys the property which he has purchased, in any reasonable sense of the word "enjoyment," although he may have had the possession of it during the whole term, such possession being constantly attended by a liability to be enforced at the end of the term, and not admitting either of indemnity or of compensation. I am therefore of opinion, that a title subject to such a liability is not a good title.

Having formed this opinion, I must allow the first, fifth, and sixth exceptions. The second exception appears to have been filed in mistake, and I apprehend that the third and fourth, after the decision upon the fifth, have become immaterial; I will observe upon the third, that I am doubtful whether there was sufficient proof of the counterpart under-lease being lost, and that if it were now material, I should refer it back to the Master.

The 17th Order of August 1841 was intended to apply to cases in which there are several Defendants answering separately.

The only two Defendants required to answer joined in one answer. It was found insufficient, and the Plaintiff obtained an order to amend, and that the Defendants might answer the exceptions and amendments together. Some of the original interrogatories were altered, and new ones added; but the note to the amended bill required the Defendants to answer all the interrogatories, without excepting those previously answered. Held, that there was no irregularity.

A Plaintiff, unless he specifically offers to do so by the bill, or is required to do so by a cross-bill, is not bound to produce, previous to the Defendant being compelled to put in his answer, documents admitted to be in his (the Plaintiff's) possession and alleged as proving his case.

This bill was filed for the settlement of disputed partnership matters, against three Defendants, Thomas Bate, William Robins, and Frances Bate. The interrogatories were properly numbered from one to twenty-two, according to the exigency of the 17th Order of August 1841. (Ord. Can. 169.) By the note at the foot, the Defendants Thomas Bate and William Robins "were respectively required to answer all the above interrogatories." No subpoena was asked against nor answer required from Frances Bate, but it was prayed, that she being served with a copy bill, might be bound by all the proceedings. The two Defendants Thomas Bate and William Robins put in a joint answer, which having, upon exceptions taken thereto, been found insufficient, the Plaintiff obtained an order to amend, and that the Defendants might answer the exceptions and amendments together. The Plaintiff accordingly amended the bill to such an extent as to require a new engrossment, and he paid to the Defendants 30s. for the costs of such amendment. Several of the old interrogatories had been slightly altered, and some entirely new ones introduced, thereby increasing the number of interrogatories from twenty-two to thirty-seven. The division of the old interrogatories was left without any variation in the amended bill, but their numbers were altered, in consequence of the introduction of the new interrogatories. The note at the foot remained the same, and required the two Defendants Thomas Bate and Robins respectively to answer "all the above interrogatories."

A second question arose out of the following circumstances.

The bill, among other things, charged, that certain indentures of the 28th and 29th of September 1826 "were in fact prepared from instructions given by the Defendants Thomas Bate and William Robins, or one of them, unknown to and without any communication with the Plaintiff and John Hezey Bate and George Bate, or any or either of them, and the said Thomas Bate and William Robins, or such of them as gave instructions for the same, caused the same to be prepared in such way as they or he thought best for their or his own views and purposes, and they always refused to produce or shew the conveyance of the said premises or the draft thereof to the Plaintiff and the said John Hezey Bate and George Bate, or any or either of them, although the Plaintiff frequently applied by letter, and otherwise for an inspection thereof, as by reference to the correspondence in the Plaintiff's possession when produced will appear." The corresponding interrogatory, after asking if inspection had not been refused, and why, proceeded, "and whether your orator has not frequently or how often applied, and whether or not by letter, and otherwise, for an inspection thereof."

The bill also, after charging a pretence on the part of the Defendant Thomas Bate, that the Plaintiff and [530] Frances Bate had given an authority, dated the 5th of September 1838, to Thomas Bate to act for them, proceeded, "and your orator charges that the said Defendant Thomas Bate has, on several occasions, stated by letter to your orator since the month of September 1838, that he had done nothing under the said alleged authority, save and except the signing, on behalf of your orator and the said Frances Bate, the deed relating to the sale to the said new joint stock company; and particularly your orator charges, that on or about the 5th of March 1842, the said Thomas Bate wrote and sent to your orator a letter [stating it] as by the said letter to which for greater certainty your orator craves leave to refer, when produced to this honourable Court will appear."

The Plaintiff, in his bill, stated two letters of the 26th of August 1826 and the 7th of September 1826, which had been sent to him; he did not, however, admit them to be in his possession, though he referred to them in these terms, "as by the said letters to which for greater certainty your orator craves leave to refer, when produced will appear." These matters were interrogated.

It was now moved, on behalf of the Defendants Thomas Bate and Robins, that they might have a month's time to put in their answer to the said Complainant's amended bill, after the interrogatories, contained in the interrogating part thereof, should have been so conveniently divided from each other, and the note at the foot of the bill so framed, as that the said Defendants should not be required to answer, or compellable to take an office copy of, such of the said interrogatories contained in the said amended bill, as were contained in the same words in the original bill, and had been fully answered by the said Defendants, [531] and also such other of the said interrogatories contained in the said amended bill, as were only varied from interrogatories in the original bill which had been fully answered by the said Defendants, by immaterial alterations, as by the additions of dates or particulars stated in the answer of the said Defendants to the original bill. And that the Complainant might pay to the said Defendants all costs which had been, and should be incurred or occasioned, by their having been required to answer and compelled to take an office copy of such interrogatories as aforesaid, and all costs of and incident to the reamendment of the said bill with reference to the purposes aforesaid; or that the Court would make such other order with reference to the dividing and numbering of the said interrogatories and the said note at the foot of the said bill as should seem meet. And further, that the said Defendants might have a month's time to answer the said amended bill, after the said Complainant had produced and deposited with the Clerk of Records and Writs for the inspection of the said Defendants, and the said Defendants should have been permitted to take copies of the documents following; that is to say, the correspondence in the said bill stated to be in the said Complainant's possession, whereby he alleges it would appear "that the said Defendants refused to produce or shew the conveyance of the premises in the bill mentioned, or the draft thereof to the said Complainant, and J. H. Bate and George Bate, or any, or either of them, although the said Complainant frequently applied by letter and otherwise for an inspection thereof," the particulars of such correspondence to be verified by affidavit; and also the letter from the Defendant Thomas Bate to the said Complainant, dated the 5th of March 1842, in the said bill stated, and the other letters in the said bill referred to, whereby, as it is [532] alleged by the said bill, "the said Defendant Thomas Bate has stated to the said Complainant since the month of September 1838 that he had done nothing under the authority in the said bill stated," except as therein mentioned; the particulars of such letters to be verified by affidavit, and also the letters from John Hazey Bate to the said Complainant, dated 26th of August 1826, and 7th of September 1836, in the said bill referred to.

That he kept no copy of the alleged letter written by him to the said Plaintiff, dated the 5th of March 1842, in the said bill set forth, or of the several other letters written by him to the Plaintiff, respecting the matters in the said bill stated.

That he and Robins could not properly put in their answer to the said Plaintiff's amended bill, until they had had the opportunity of inspecting the said alleged letter of the 5th of March 1842, and the other letters in the said bill referred to, whereby, as was alleged by the said bill, "the Defendant Thomas Bate had, on several occasions, stated by letter to the said Plaintiff, since the month of September 1838," &c., &c., and also the correspondence in the said bill stated to be in the Plaintiff's possession, whereby he alleges it will appear, "that the indentures of the 28th and 29th of September 1826," &c.

Mr. Roupell and Mr. Prior, in support of the motion, argued that the Plaintiff was bound by the 17th Order of August 1841 (Ordines Can. 169), to specify the interrogatories in the amended bill, to which he required an answer in order [533] "that the office copy of the bill taken by the Defendant should not contain any interrogatories, except those which such Defendant was required to answer;" and to save the Defendants the expense of taking an office copy of the bill, to which a further answer was not required.

That this was like a case in which the Plaintiff having abandoned a portion of his case, was ordered to pay the costs of the portion so abandoned; Strickland v. Strickland (3 Beav. 224); and the application ought to be made immediately upon the cause of complaint arising. (Mounsey v. Burnham, 1 Hare, p. 22.) Secondly, that the Plaintiff was bound to produce the documents in his possession, without which it would be impossible for the Defendants properly to put in their answer to the amended bill. (Shepherd v. Morris, 1 Beav. 175; Taylor v. Heming, 4 Beav. 235.)

Mr. Kindersley, Mr. G. Turner, and Mr. Heathfield, contrâ, contended that the General Order referred to did not apply to a sole Defendant (Lynch v. Leccome, 1 Hare, 626, and see Boucher v. Branscombe, 5 Beav. 545), or to a case like the present, where two Defendants answered together, and that there was no hardship as the Defendants well knew what part of the original bill had been found by the Master to have been insufficiently answered, and the new matter was easily distinguishable.

Secondly, that a Plaintiff was not bound, at the instance of a Defendant, to produce documents which might be in his possession, except he offered by his bill to do so, or unless required by a cross-bill.

The following cases were also cited, Jones v. Lewis (2 Sim. & St. 242, and 4 Sim. 324), [534] Penfold v. Nunn (5 Sim. 409), Muntz v. Lord Lauderdale (V.-C. E. 1840), Princess of Wales v. Lord Liverpool (1 Swan. 114, 580, and 3 Swan. 567, and 1 Wils. C. C. 113, and 2, Ibid. 29; and see Jackson v. Sedgwick, 2 Wils. C. C. 167), Milligan v. Mitchell (6 Sim. 186).

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. Independently of the question of costs, this motion has two objects, one of which is, in substance, to compel the Plaintiff to produce for the inspection of the Defendants, certain letters which are in his possession; and the other is, to compel the Plaintiff to alter the form of his bill by a further distribution of the interrogatories into numbers. Those two objects are quite distinct from each other, and require a separate consideration.

It is perfectly plain, and it has never been doubted, that the General Order which directed the Plaintiff to number the interrogatories in his bill (Ord. Can. 169), was intended to apply to cases, in which there were several Defendants answering separately. The object is perfectly plain, although it must be conceded, the order is so expressed as to apply itself to all bills; where therefore we come to apply this order to particular cases, we must have regard to that particular object.

In this case there are three Defendants, one of whom has not been called upon to answer at all; and the other two, although there seem to be charges against them which are distinct, are nevertheless so jointly concerned in interest, that they joined in one answer. There is no complaint as to the form of the original bill. The interrogatories appear to have been num-[535]-bered in a manner that is not complained of. These interrogatories were not fully answered; which is a most material matter in the consideration of this particular case. Exceptions were taken and allowed. A further insufficient answer was put in, and an order was then obtained, that the Plaintiff should have leave to amend his bill, and that the Defendants should answer the amendments and exceptions altogether. It is therefore obvious, that the Defendants could not be under any ambiguity, as to what it was their duty to answer; they were to answer the exceptions and to answer the amendments. Moreover, there is a General Order "that a Defendant shall not be bound to answer any statement or charge in the bill unless specially and particularly interrogated thereto" (16th Order of August 1841; Ord. Can. 168): therefore, as to any amendments which were not specially and particularly interrogated to, they were not bound to answer. They knew, therefore, perfectly well, that what they were to do was, to answer the exceptions which had not formerly been sufficiently answered, and to answer the amendments which were interrogated to.

The nature of all of the amendments I do not know, but there are some that may have been very material, others which are alleged to have been very immaterial. Several of the interrogatories seem to have been altered in points, which, as far as I have the means of judging of them from the statements, seem to have been very trifling; but nevertheless, they may or may not have been of the utmost importance, for I have known cases in which the alteration of a mere word has produced material discovery, which, without that small alteration, would never have been obtained. It is impossible in the course of proceedings to foretell what may be important [536] for the purpose of obtaining from the Defendant that discovery which the Plaintiff has a right to, and the order which has been so often referred to was certainly never framed for the purpose, in the least degree, of cramping the power of the Plaintiff of obtaining important discovery. The power undoubtedly is very great, and has often been greatly abused, but unless that power did exist, no discovery would ever be obtained from a fraudulent Defendant.

This bill, however, is amended, and there are amendments in the interrogatories, but none in the note by which the Defendants are called upon to answer, "all the above interrogatories," the note, therefore, had reference to the interrogatories contained in the original bill, as well to those which remained unaltered as to those which were altered. The consequence was, that the Defendants were left, as they would have been before the General Order was made, to discover to what part of the amended bill, as it stood, they were to put in their answer. Now I do not think there was any great inconvenience in this, but it is said, if you had specified the parts of the amended bill which I was to answer, I might have excluded the other interrogatories from my office copy, and this omission thus to distinguish the interrogatories has, in the argument, been called "a vexatious amendment." I do not mean at all to say, that the Plaintiff might not have made that distinction. I think he might have so managed, as by a reference in the note at the foot of the bill, to point out distinctly to the Defendants, the interrogatories or parts of interrogatories to which he required an answer. The question, however, is, whether he was under an obligation to do so. I am of opinion he was not. He could not, in this case, make any distinction between the different Defendants who were to answer [537] separately. The Defendants had no hardship put upon them; they were only to answer the amendments to the bill which were particularly interrogated to, and the parts previously found to have been insufficiently answered. I think, therefore, that the first part of the motion fails.

Upon the other part of the motion a very material question arises. The question is, how far the Plaintiff, who refers to documents in his possession as evidence of the fact which he distinctly charges, is bound to produce that evidence before the Defendant is bound to put in his answer; that I take to be the question which is raised here. There have been several cases upon this subject; and I think they may be divided into two classes: first, cases like that of the Princess of Wales v. Lord Liverpool; and secondly, the two several cases which came before me, and have been referred to, namely, Taylor v. Hemming and Shepherd v. Morris. Those were cases in which the Plaintiff by his bill not only stated that he had possession of the documents, but intending to use those documents in support of his case, he called upon the Defendant to look at them, and offered to produce them for the purpose. The Plaintiff, in substance and effect, stated by his bill, that the Defendant could not give the answer which the Plaintiff desired to have for his own use, unless the Defendant would look at those documents; and the Plaintiff having done that, then refused to produce the documents. I think I may assume, after the investigation which this case has undergone, that there is no case whatever to be produced, in which the Plaintiff, charging a particular fact to be within the knowledge of the Defendant, and stating, further, that he has evidence of the fact in letters which are in his possession, has been held bound to produce those documents, before the Defendant could be called upon to put in his answer. The strong impression upon my mind is, that there is no such case. None so contrary to the ordinary principle has been produced, and I believe, that if you were to lay it down, as a proposition, that a Plaintiff shall not proceed, until the Defendant knows the evidence which the Plaintiff has, you would state a proposition very much at variance with the ordinary opinion of mankind as well as of lawyers. No doubt you have a right, in this Court, to look at the evidence which the Plaintiff states to be in his possession; but that right is only to be obtained upon a cross-bill. Every party has, in this Court, that advantage which is not to be had so effectually in any other jurisdiction. He may discover that which is in the knowledge and breast of the Plaintiff before he proceeds to a hearing of the cause, but he must do it in such a way as to give the Plaintiff the opportunity of stating all the circumstances connected with the matter. It is undoubtedly extremely important, when the Plaintiff is called upon to furnish any discovery, that he should do it in the proper form, and be at liberty to state all the circumstances relating to the matter, and that he should have all the guard and protection which he derives from being able to give a full statement of all the circumstances belonging to the case.

Some observations having, during the argument, been made as to the mode of drawing bills, I wish to have it clearly understood, that in my opinion the more strictly accordant with truth a bill is, the better; but I cannot say it has been the rule of this Court, that if a bill is not, in every part of it, strictly in accordance with truth, that it is therefore to be considered as a vexatious bill. Many complicated and difficult circumstances arise in which a party is, by fraud, kept out of the knowledge of the facts which are essential to the support of his [539] case, so that being kept entirely ignorant of the real facts, he is under the necessity, though wishing to adhere to the truth, of connecting facts which may be within his knowledge with other circumstances which he can only surmise, and which may or may not be according to truth. The Defendant being then compelled to answer usually affords information which enables the Plaintiff, by amendment, to state his case better, and perhaps more in accordance with the truth.

It is said in this case that we know that the Plaintiff has written evidence, for he alleges it himself, and that it would be much more convenient to the Defendants to see it before they answer, because they are charged with a distinct fact to be evidenced by that written document. Suppose, however, the Plaintiff had done that which he might have done, namely, omitted all notice of the letters, and had charged the Defendants with a fact; and that the Defendants had in their answer denied the fact to be true, and that the Plaintiff had thereupon amended his bill charging the same fact, and had said "in evidence thereof, I have those letters," would not that course of proceeding, though open to the Plaintiff, have been much more vexatious? Would it not have been more likely to have harassed the Defendants? Was it not at least fair and honest, on the part of the Plaintiff, when he charged the Defendants with the fact, at the same time to intimate to them (if the fact be so), that he had got the letters in his possession which proved the fact charged, and which the Defendants might compel the production of by filing a cross-bill? In practice, I have known instances of a Plaintiff stating, that there existed certain documents proving the fact charged, when there were none, and thereby intimidating the Defendant from stating the truth of his [540] own case: that, no doubt, would be a vexatious and fraudulent mode of stating a case.

That is not suggested here: on the contrary, this motion proceeds on the notion of the existence of the documents, which the Plaintiff states to be evidence in support of his bill, and upon an allegation that the Defendants have a right to see that evidence, before they are called upon to put in their answer.

I think that the second part of the motion also fails, and, the motion failing altogether, must therefore be refused with costs.

[540] BUNNETT v. FOSTER. (Ex relatione Mr. De Gez.) April 18, 19, 1844.

Costs of an administration suit directed to be paid rateably out of the real and personal estate.

James Worship, by his will, dated 17th of March 1786, devised his real estate in trust for his niece for her life, and after her decease, to pay the yearly rents and profits to her daughter, Ann Le Fevre, for her separate use for her life, and upon further trust to sell, as soon as conveniently might be after the death of the survivor. And he bequeathed his residuary personal estate to his trustees to be converted into money, the interest to be paid to the same tenants for life, and in the same way as the rents and profits of his real estate. And the trustees were to be possessed of the monies, so to remain out at interest during the lives of the tenants for life, at their decease, and of all the monies to arise from the sale of the real estate, upon trust to pay £100 to each child of [541] Mrs. Le Fevre who should survive her, and to pay the residue of such monies, or the whole, if Mrs. Le Fevre left no child living at her death, unto all the testator's brothers' and sisters' children who should be alive at the death of Mrs. Le Fevre, equally share and share alike, or their respective executors and administrators.

The property comprised both real and personal estate.

The testator died in 1792, his niece in 1814, and Mrs. Le Fevre in 1836. No child of Mrs. Le Fevre, or of any of the brothers and sisters of the testator, was living at Mrs. Le Fevre's death.

This was a bill filed, by one of the legal personal representatives of the next of kin of the testator living at his death, against two persons, each of whom claimed to be heir at law, the trustees, and a party claiming to be next of kin of a child of one of the testator's sisters, praying for the administration of the testator's property. Two questions were raised on the pleadings, first, whether there was a conversion of the realty into personalty, out and out, so as to entitle the next of kin to the whole of the assets, the greater part of which had, in fact, been converted into money since the testator's death. Secondly, whether, under the limitation to the testator's brothers' and sisters' children living at Mrs. Le Fevre's death, or their respective executors and administrators, the next of kin of a child who died in Mrs. Le Fevre's lifetime might not take by substitution.

Inquiries were directed at the original hearing, and by the report it appeared, that the next of kin of the testator living at his death were ten in number: that all of them were dead, and that there were legal personal representatives of three only, the Plaintiff being one of [542] such representatives. It also appeared that the next of kin of the children of brothers and sisters of the testator interested in the second question exceeded thirty in number, and that there were personal representatives of a very few of them.

The cause now coming on for further directions,

Mr. De Gex, for the Plaintiff.

Mr. Roupell, for the trustees, submitted that they would not be indemnified, by a decree pronounced in the absence of any of the parties interested in the questions in dispute.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Borrett, for the heir at law.

Mr. G. Turner, Mr. Elmsley, and Mr. Bird, for other parties, submitted that all the different interests were as well represented as convenience and the practicability of carrying on the suit would allow, having regard to the number of parties and the amount of the property. They cited Harvey v. Harvey (4 Beav. 215, and 5 Beav. 134).

Mr. Roupell, in reply, said, that in Harvey v. Harvey there was no final decision or distribution of the fund, as was sought here.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS said, that the practice of allowing some members of a class to represent the whole in certain cases had been adopted on grounds of convenience, but that in this respect every case must be governed by its own circumstances. That it would nevertheless be extremely unsatisfactory to a party, [543] whose property had in his absence been adjudged to another, to be told that it had been done for the sake of convenience. The other questions in dispute might, however, be argued, the decision on the question of parties being reserved.

The case then proceeded.

On the question of conversion, Cruse v. Barley (3 P. W. 20), Fletcher v. Ashburner (1 Brown (C. C.), 497), Phillips v. Phillips (1 My. & K. 649), and Jessopp v. Watson (1 My. & K. 665) were cited.

Mr. Bird, on behalf of the next of kin of the child of one of the testator's sisters, admitted that the claim to take by substitution could not be sustained.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] observed, that the latter point was so clear that there could be no ground for bringing before the Court any of the other parties interested in maintaining it; that the question of conversion might admit of more argument, but still there appeared to him no sufficient reason for holding that the testator intended a conversion out and out. That, unfortunately, this was a very vague expression ; but that the case of the heir at law did not require it to be laid down, as had been contended, that there could, in no case, be a conversion except for the purposes of an express trust. That it was sufficient to say that there did not appear to be any indication of an intention to convert the property for any other purposes than those specifically pointed out, and which had failed. That if his Lordship entertained any reasonable degree of doubt [544] on the point, he should have felt great difficulty in finally disposing of it, adversely to the absent parties, and in distributing the property without reserving to them an opportunity of supporting their own case ; but that the Court could only act upon the strength of its own impression, and that he thought, under the circumstances of the case, and with the opinion which he entertained as to the possibility of the question being successfully argued, he should not be justified in burdening the property in dispute with the expense of bringing any other parties before the Court.

His Lordship held that the realty, and the proceeds of so much of it as had been sold, belonged to the heir, and that the personalty belonged to the next of kin of the testator living at his decease.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Borrett asked that the costs might come out of the personalty, the question having arisen out of the construction of the will, and the claim of the heir having been held so clear that a decision could be made against absent next of kin. But,

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS considered that the decision of the Court would benefit the real estate, as well as the personal, by removing difficulties as to the title of the parties claiming it, and he directed the costs to be paid rateably out of the realty and personalty according to their value.

See Eyre v. Marsden, 2 Keen, 564, and 4 Myl. & Cr. 231.

[545] BATHER v. KEARSLEY. May 2, 1844.

The bill sought to charge trustees with mismanagement and misapplication of the trust estate. The answer insisted that one of the two Co-plaintiffs had acquiesced. The Court, upon motion, gave leave to amend by making such Co-plaintiff a Defendant, upon payment of the costs of the application, and giving security for the costs already incurred. The costs of the misjoinder were reserved to the hearing.

This bill was filed by Mary Bather, the wife of the Defendant Thomas Justice Bather, by her next friend, and by Thomas Bather. Mary Bather had a life interest without power of anticipation in the trust property which was the subject of the suit, and Thomas Bather had an interest in remainder.

The bill sought an account, &c., of the real and personal estate of the testator, and also sought to charge the trustees with mismanagement and misapplication of the trust property.

The Defendants, by their answer, set up a case of acquiescence on the part of the Plaintiff Thomas Bather.

The Plaintiffs now moved for liberty to amend their bill, by striking out the name of Thomas Bather as a Plaintiff and making him a Defendant. An affidavit was filed by the Plaintiffs' solicitor, stating that he was not aware of the existence of any question as to acquiescence until he read the answer.

Mr. Turner and Mr. J. Baily, in support of the motion.

They cited Small v. Atwood (2 You. & Jer. 512), and Aylwin v. Bray therein cited, p. 518.

[546] Mr. J. H. Palmer, Mr. Cox, and Mr. Rolt, for the Defendants.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] granted the application, but upon the terms of the Plaintiffs paying the costs of the motion, and giving security for the costs up to the present time, and he reserved the costs incurred by the misjoinder until the hearing of the cause.

[546] PEERS v. LAMBERT. May 3, 1844.

A. contracted to sell a wharf on the banks of the Thames, with a jetty. The jetty turned out to be liable to be removed by the Corporation of London, if they thought fit. Held, that the jetty was essential to the beneficial occupation and enjoyment of the premises contracted to be sold, and that a specific performance could not be decreed.

This was a bill for specific performance of an agreement.

The Plaintiff put up some property for sale by auction, which, in the particulars of sale, was described as a very valuable copyhold property, known as Ashton's Wharf, consisting of superior water-side premises, first-rate wharf, with jetty, extensive warehouses, rigging-house, counting-house, and shop, situate at Blackwall. The particulars also stated, that "this property, of which immediate possession may be obtained, is copyhold of the manor of Stepney, otherwise Stebonheath, subject to a fine on death or alienation of £2, 2s. certain, and to the annual quit rent of 4d." A printed plan was referred to, upon which was delineated a jetty, projecting from the front of the wharf into the Thames.

The Defendant became the purchaser for £5820, and a bill for specific performance having been instituted, it was referred to the Master to ascertain whether a good title could be shewn.

[547] The Master reported "that a good title could be made to the said premises, except as to a certain jetty in the agreement mentioned: and he found, that such good title, except as aforesaid, was first shewn before the institution of this suit. And as to the said jetty to which a good title could not be made according to the said agreement, he found that the same was a wooden structure, with a wooden top placed upon wooden piles, between high and low water mark of the river Thames, and was subject to the regulations of the navigation committee of the Corporation of the City of London, and liable at any time to be removed; in case the said corporation should think fit to remove the same. And he found that the said jetty was essential to the beneficial occupation and enjoyment of the said premises contracted to be sold as aforesaid."

The Plaintiff excepted to the report.

Mr. Turner and Mr. Baily, for the Plaintiff.

Mr. Kindersley, contra.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] concurred with the Master in opinion that the jetty was essential to the enjoyment of the property; and he, therefore, overruled the exceptions, and dismissed the bill with costs.

[548] ROWLEY v. ADAMS. May 25, 28, 31, July 31, 1844.

[For other proceedings, see S. C. 7 Beav. 395 and note thereto.]

A. and B. purchased realty out of their partnership assets, which was used for their partnership purposes, and was, in equity, to be considered as personalty. A new partnership was formed between A., B., and C. The realty was continued to be used for the partnership purposes, but A. and B. stipulated for a rent to be paid them by the new partnership, composed of A., B. and C. A. died. Held, the property was, in equity, to be considered as part of his real estate.

Legatees made bond fide endeavours to realize the primary fund on which legacies were charged, but failed to prove the existence of such primary fund, by reason of the non-production of the account books. The real estate (being the secondary fund) was directed to be sold for payment of the legacies, but the decree was made without prejudice to any claim which might be made in respect of the primary fund, in any other proceeding against any party who might be answerable for the same.

This case, reported ante (p. 395), now came on to be heard upon the twentieth exception, and on further directions and costs.

July 31. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. This case came on to be heard on the twentieth of the exceptions taken to the Master's report, and for further directions and on costs.

The Master has found, that the testator was entitled to three fourth parts of a house and premises in Portpool Lane, which were not devised by his will, but which descended to Henry Earley Wyatt as heir at law, and the exception alleges, that there was no evidence to shew that the testator was entitled to three-fourths of the house and property, or whether the same descended to Henry Earley Wyatt as his heir at law, or was to be considered as part of the partnership property, or as otherwise in equity, converted into personalty.

The property was, in fact, purchased by Henry Wyatt and Henry Earley Wyatt out of their partnership assets, for their partnership purposes, and belonged to them in [549] the proportion in which they were interested in the partnership, and whilst used for the purposes of the partnership, it was to be considered as personalty; but, upon the admission of George Wyatt into the partnership, the firm of Henry Wyatt & Son was put an end to, and the house and premises ceased to be used merely as partnership assets of the owners. The two owners, Henry Wyatt and Henry Earley Wyatt, held the property distinct from the partnership and trading property of the three partners, Henry Wyatt, Henry Earley Wyatt, and George Wyatt, and they stipulated for a rent. There was, therefore, in two partners, an ownership of the property and a right to receive rent, and, in the three partners, a possession for which rent was paid; and although the three used the possession for the purposes of the trade of the three, including the two owners, yet I think, that the right of the two owners, to whom as landlords the rent became due, must be considered as real estate. The contest, in this case, appears to me to be of no importance to Henry Earley Wyatt, because, upon consideration of the testator's will, I am of opinion, that the real estate of Henry Wyatt, which descended to Henry Earley Wyatt as his heir, is subject to the payment of the legacies given by his will; but I think that the finding of the Master is correct, and that the twentieth exception must be overruled.

Upon the further directions, the principal question is, whether the Plaintiffs, the legatees, are now entitled to have the testator's real estate descended or devised, sold for the payment of their legacies; and I think that they are. The Plaintiffs have, in vain, attempted to realize the primary fund out of which the testator directed the legacies to be paid. They have endeavoured to prove that such primary fund really existed, and on the supposition of its having had an existence, they have used endeavours, the sincerity of which cannot be doubted, to [550] charge the executors personally with the loss of it. In these endeavours they have failed. It is not now, and the probability is that it never can be known with certainty, whether the funds applicable, in priority to the real estate, existed or not, or who is answerable for it, if it did exist; and the Plaintiffs having done all in their power to ascertain the primary fund and make it available, so as to avoid resorting to the real estate, I am of opinion, that they ought not to be delayed further, and are now entitled to have the real estate sold.

It is very unsatisfactory to be obliged to make a decree under such circumstances. However improbable, it is still possible that it may be discovered that there was a primary fund, and that some of the parties to this cause are answerable for it; and in order to leave the means of redress open, as far as I can, consistently with the rights of the Plaintiffs, I must make this decree without prejudice to any claim which may be made in respect of the primary fund, in any other proceedings against any party who may be answerable for the same.

It does not appear to me that any order ought now to be made for the payment of the rents of the real estates received by Henry Earley Wyatt or William.

Provision must be made for payment of the several sums of money which the Master has found to be due to Adams, to Marks, and to the estate of Hannah Wyatt.

With respect to the costs, so far as the suits relate to the establishment of the will, and the account of such parts of the personal estate of the testator as did not consist of his share or interest in the partnership, I think that all parties are entitled to their costs; the executors having their costs as between solicitor and client. So far as the suits relate to the accounts of the partner-[551]-ship dealings and property, and with respect to the special inquiries, and the exceptions which relate thereto, I am of opinion that the parties, other than the executors, and Henry Earley Wyatt and George Wyatt and his assignees, are entitled to their costs; but having regard to all the circumstances of the case, I am of opinion, that neither the executors, nor Henry Earley Wyatt, nor George Wyatt, nor his assignees, are entitled to any costs.

It was strongly urged, that I ought to charge the executors with the whole costs of the suit, or at least with the particular costs to which I have last adverted; but on consideration, I think that I ought not to charge them, as I should have done, if I could have agreed with the Master's report on the principal exceptions.

[551] ARCHER v. HUDSON. July 8, 11, 1844.

A niece, two months after she came of age, and after her guardians had fully accounted to her, entered into a voluntary security for her uncle, by whom she had been brought up, and who was considered by the Court as standing in loco parentis. The Court set it aside.

Where a transaction takes place between parent and child, just after the child has attained twenty-one, and prior to what may be called a complete "emancipation," without any benefit moving to the child, the presumption is that an undue influence has been exercised on the part of the child, and a party seeking to maintain such a transaction must shew that that presumption is adequately rebutted.

Though Courts of Equity do not interfere to prevent an act even of bounty between parent and child, yet they will see that the child is placed in such a position as will enable him to form an entirely free and unfettered judgment, independent altogether of any sort of control.

Surety by promissory note, for a floating balance due to bankers from a customer, held released by the bankers crediting the customer with the full amount of the note, without advancing the money at the time.

In 1825 the surviving parent of the Plaintiff, Mrs. Archer (then Miss Kendray), died, leaving her an orphan of the age of about nine years. For about seven years previous to her attaining twenty-one, she [552] resided with her uncle and aunt, Mr. and Mrs. Daniel at Thirsk. Miss Kendray was entitled to some property, consisting of a sum of £1112, and the moiety of some houses, &c., producing an income of about £145 a year. During her minority her uncle "was paid a suitable sum for her maintenance by her guardian, out of the income of her property."

On the 8th of November 1837 Miss Kendray attained her age of twenty-one years, whereupon her guardians transferred her property to her, and she, on the 21st of the same month, executed a release to them.

It appeared that in July 1837 her uncle Daniel had opened an account with the Thirsk branch of the York Union Banking Company, of which Hauxwell was the manager. At the end of December Daniel had overdrawn his account to the extent of £70.

About the 1st of January 1838 Miss Kendray joined, as surety for her uncle Mr. Daniel, in a promissory note for £500 to the bank, and by that note, she and her uncle jointly and severally promised to pay the bank the sum of £500 with interest. The note was handed over, but was not at that time entered in the bankers' books. The way in which it was afterwards dealt with will be presently stated.

On the 13th of November 1841 Miss Kendray married the Plaintiff, Mr. Archer.

After the marriage, the bank appeared to have made some inquiries as to the property of Miss Kendray, and on the 9th of December 1841 the £500, the promissory note, was placed to the credit of Daniel's account, but entered in the bankers' books under date [553] the 12th of November 1841, this being the day previous to her marriage, at which time the balance against Daniel appeared to be about £96.

In 1843 Daniel became insolvent. Being then indebted to the bankers in a sum exceeding £500, they, on the 24th of April 1843, commenced an action at law against the Plaintiffs, to recover the amount secured by the promissory note of £500. The Plaintiffs thereupon instituted this suit, in order to get relieved from their liability under the note.

Thus far the facts of the case were beyond dispute; it is now necessary to state the material allegations of the bill and the evidence in support of them.

The bill alleged, that the signature of Miss Kendray to the note had been obtained by a scheme or plan between her uncle and the agent of the banking company, entered into previous to her coming of age. That she signed it with reluctance, and entirely through the influence which her uncle and aunt had acquired over her. That it was represented to be a matter of form, and that she would never be required to pay anything in consequence. The bill stated, that the note was given for the amount then in arrear, which the bill alleged had been discharged by subsequent payments by Daniel; and that, under the circumstances aforesaid, the note was fraudulent and void, and ought to be delivered up to be cancelled.

The bill charged "that if the note was ever discounted by the company, the same was not discounted, or the amount thereof credited to Daniel, until some time after the date thereof, and was so discounted unknown to the Plaintiffs, and was not carried to a separate [554] account to the debts of the Plaintiffs and Daniel, but remained in the possession of the company, as a note payable on demand by Daniel; and the company, by so dealing with the note, destroyed such right, if any, as they previously had, to hold the same as a collateral security for the balance due from Daniel to the said company; and that the subsequent payment by Daniel to the company exceeded the amount of the promissory note, and of the balance then due to the company, and ought, if necessary, to be applied to the satisfaction of the note and of the balance."

The bill prayed a declaration, that the promissory note had been fraudulently obtained from the Plaintiff by Daniel and the banking company, and was fraudulent and void against the Plaintiffs; and that if not fraudulent and void, then for a declaration, that the subsequent payment to the bank ought to be applied in reduction of the balance due on the promissory note.

The answer denied all the allegations of the fraud and the alleged scheme, and stated, "that about the months of November or December 1837, the account of Daniel with the banking company being overdrawn, Daniel proposed to Mr. Hauxwell, that he and his niece Frances Kendray should give to the banking company a joint and several promissory note for £500 and interest, as a collateral and continuing security to the company for the balance that might, from time to time, become due from Daniel to the said banking company on his account with them, and that the same should be a continuing guarantee to them for the balance of the banking account of the said C. Daniel."

The evidence on the part of the Plaintiffs went to shew the control and influence which Mr. and Mrs. [555] Daniel had acquired and exercised over their niece, the subsistence of an intimacy between Daniel and Hauxwell, and of the knowledge of the latter of the circumstances, fortune, and situation of Miss Kendray, but there was no evidence whatever of any fraudulent scheme between the parties.

Hauxwell was examined as a witness for the Defendants. He denied the alleged intimacy between himself and Daniel, and stated as follows:—"Daniel was allowed by me to overdraw his account at the said Thirsk branch of the York Union Banking Company to a small amount, because I considered him safe. At the end of December 1837 Daniel had overdrawn his account the sum of £70, 7s. 2d. In the latter part of December 1837 Daniel mentioned to me his wish, that the branch bank would allow him to overdraw his account for his accommodation to a greater extent; he gave as a reason why he wished so to draw, that he would thereby be enabled to go into the market and buy his leather for ready money, instead of buying leather and paying with acceptances. When Daniel so applied to me, he wished to be allowed to overdraw to the extent of £500. I asked him what security he could give, and he proposed his niece Frances Kendray. He said he had not spoken to her on the subject, but he would do so, and let me know. About a week afterwards, Daniel called at the branch bank, and stated to me, that he had spoken to his niece, and she was agreeable to sign a promissory note for £500, but she did not like to come to the bank, from a fear of causing some suspicion that she was going to be bound for her uncle to the bank; that if I would prepare a note in the usual form, and take it down some evening to his (Daniel's) house, where she resided, she would sign it."

[556] The same witness also stated: "That he accordingly prepared a joint and several promissory note, and took it to the house of Daniel between the 1st and the 6th of January 1838. That he produced the promissory note, and told Miss Kendray that it was a joint promissory note for £500, but we did not want £500 of her uncle at that time (the balance owing by him at that time being very small), but that he might want money to the extent of £500, and he asked her, if she was willing to sign the note he then produced; to which she answered, that she was willing to do so. He then requested her to read the said promissory note, which she did accordingly. That Daniel then signed the promissory note, and immediately afterwards the said Frances Kendray signed her name to it. That before the note was signed by the said Daniel and Frances Kendray, he told the said Frances Kendray, that supposing her uncle should want money to the extent of £500 by her signing that note, she made herself liable to the bank to the extent of £500 and interest, in case the bank should ever want that amount of him; she said that she perfectly understood it."

The witness also said, "I then stated, that the said promissory note was to be a security for the amount then due to the said bank from the said Christopher Daniel, or for any amount that might be due, either upon the open account, or upon bills running to the extent of £500 and interest;" and the witness said, "In my opinion and judgment, the said note was signed by the said Complainant Frances Kendray readily and not reluctantly, nor in ignorance, but with the full knowledge of the liability she was thereby incurring."

The cause now came on for hearing.

[557] Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Rolt, for the Plaintiffs, contended, first, that the transaction was void ab initio, the promissory note having been obtained by an uncle, standing in loco parentis, from his niece immediately after her coming of age. That the principles of the Court with regard to transactions between guardian and ward (1 Mad. Ch. Pr. 123, and 1 Story Eq. Jur. 253), and parent and child (1 Mad. Ch. Pr. 309, and 1 Story Eq. Jur. 249), were applicable to the present case; that the protection of infancy continued after the Plaintiff attained her majority (see 3 Swan. 69), and that the Defendants, who took with notice, by their agent, of the invalidity of the transaction, were bound. Secondly, that there was no memorandum shewing that the note was given as a security for a floating balance. Thirdly, that by the mode of dealing with the note in December 1841, the position of the surety had been altered: for the note, instead of being kept as a continuing guarantee for the ultimate balance due from the principal, as the Defendants said was the intention, had been cashed, and an immediate right to sue for the whole amount created; Bonser v. Cas (4 Beav. 379, and 6 Beav. 110). Fourthly, that the £500 having been treated as a loan from the 12th of November 1841, every subsequent payment made by Daniel to the bankers must be applied in exoneration of the surety.

Mr. Turner, and Mr. Elmsley, contra, for the banking company. The bill alleges and proceeds on a fraudulent contrivance between Daniel and Hauxwell, of which there is not the slightest proof. The transaction was bona fide on the part of the banking company; their advances did not exceed £70 at the time, and they had no inducement to procure the Plaintiff in joining in [558] assisting her uncle. The influence proved in the evidence is wholly influence on the part of the Plaintiff's aunt, and not of her uncle. The circumstances appear to have been fully explained, and the Plaintiff was perfectly aware of the nature of the transaction, and of the liability she was about to incur. If this be not sufficient, no transaction between a parent and child, by which the former was benefitted by the latter, could stand. The conduct of the Plaintiff who seeks to raise an equity against Defendants, who have bona fide advanced their money on her security, must be regarded. She induced the bank to trust her uncle; years have elapsed, and after all the alleged influence has ceased, she has permitted the bank to continue their dealings with and to make advances to her uncle, without making any complaint or challenging the validity of her security until he became insolvent. This course of acquiescence deprives her of the right (if she ever had any) of undoing this transaction.

The security was a continuing security, and therefore the subsequent payments by Daniel to the bankers are not to be applied in discharge of the note. Pease v. Hirst (10 B. & Cr. 122). The placing the note to the credit of Daniel's account in no way altered the situation or liability of the surety. The Plaintiffs are not therefore discharged.

Mr. Glasse, for the Defendant Daniel.

Mr. Kindersley, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. There cannot be any doubt, in this case, that Mr. Daniel was, in respect of Miss Kendray, standing in loco [559] parentis. Being desirous of overdrawing his account at his bankers, he proposed as his surety his niece, a young lady living under his protection, as a child lives under the protection of a parent, who had just attained her age of twenty-one years, and had just then been put into possession of her property. It is fully proved, in the cause, that Mr. Hauxwell was well acquainted with the relative situation of Mr. Daniel and this young lady: he was in the habit of associating with them; he says he was not intimate with them; but there are witnesses who prove that he had associated with Mr. Daniel, and also with this young lady, and that the circumstances of this young lady were perfectly well known to him.

A communication was to be made on the subject between the uncle and niece standing in this situation; the result, as was expected, was, that she consented to become security for her uncle. It appears, however, "that she did not like to come to the bank, from a fear of causing some suspicion that she was going to be bound for her uncle to the bank." This young lady, being asked to do what I suppose must be considered as an act of kindness to her uncle, was afraid that it should be known that she was going to do that act of kindness, and, therefore, this business was not to be conducted in the ordinary way; she was not to go to the bank for the purpose of signing this promissory note, but Mr. Hauxwell was to visit the parties in order that this might be done in a more secret manner. She however signed the note in the manner stated by Mr. Hauxwell in his evidence.

The first point made in this case is, that that transaction cannot stand at all, because the security was obtained through the influence of a person standing in loco [560] parentis, from the object of his protection and care, and that therefore is a transaction which this Court will not support. The relation between the parties is undoubted. She, by signing this promissory note for the benefit of her uncle standing in loco parentis, without any consideration or advantage moving towards herself, became subject to this liability. This is a transaction, which, under ordinary circumstances, this Court will not allow; and really the question is, whether there is anything in this case to take it out of the ordinary rule which the Court applies in other cases of a like kind.

Nobody has ever asserted that there cannot be a pecuniary transaction between a parent and child, the child being of age, but everybody will affirm in this Court, that if there be a pecuniary transaction between parent and child, just after the child attains the age of twenty-one years, and prior to what may be called a complete "emancipation," without any benefit moving to the child, the presumption is, that an undue influence has been exercised to procure that liability on the part of the child, and that it is the business and the duty of the party, who endeavours to maintain such a transaction, to shew, that that presumption is adequately rebutted; and that it may be adequately rebutted is perfectly clear. This Court does not interfere to prevent an act even of bounty between parent and child, but it will take care (under the circumstances in which the parent and child are placed before the emancipation of the child) that such child is placed in such a position as will enable him to form an entirely free and unfettered judgment, independent altogether of any sort of control.

The question then is, whether, under the circumstances of this case, we have any evidence of that kind. Mr. Hauxwell, representing the bank, knew the relative [561] position of the parties; he knew that the object was to obtain the liability of the child, for the benefit and accommodation of the uncle; he knew they were living together at the time. He went and assisted the uncle and aunt, both of whom were present at the very time. It therefore does not appear, that this young lady was ever severed from the influence which the uncle and aunt had over her, so as to enable her to form an adequate, full, and independent opinion as to what she ought in prudence to have done. I do not mean to say, that if this young lady had her trustees, or some friend or relation of the family, or somebody interested in her welfare, to advise and consult with, in the absence of the uncle and aunt, that the circumstance of her situation and the circumstance of the uncle's situation might not have been such, that this Court would have said that, having entered into this liability, she should be held by it. It might have been so; but to say that Mr. Hauxwell, the agent of the bank, a person with whom the uncle was dealing, the person through whom he is carrying on his business as a customer of the bank, by explaining to an inexperienced young woman who had just attained her age of twenty-one years the meaning of this note, offered anything like such a protection as would secure to her that free and independent judgment which she had a right to exercise, seems to me to go far beyond anything which has been proved in this case.

It does not appear to me, taking this transaction as it stands upon the evidence before me, that it can be supported even on the first ground.

I think also, that it cannot be supported on the second ground. The second ground is this, that she was only security for a floating balance, and that, instead of treat-[562]-ing her as a surety for a floating balance, an attempt was made to make her a debtor for the whole sum, without regard to the circumstances of the account upon which that balance was to arise. This young lady having signed this joint and several promissory note in January 1838, married Mr. Archer upon the 13th of November 1841. What had been done with this note in the meanwhile? The promissory note was given to Mr. Hauxwell, and was kept among the securities of the bank. The account, as between the bank and Mr. Daniel, was an account between them alone, not affected in any way by this transaction; sums were paid in and drawn out, and the note was dealt with as in the ordinary mode of dealing between a bank and a customer, where a security is deposited for a floating balance. The promissory note was joint and several, and payable upon demand; but it did not, on the face of it, represent the real contract. The contract, Mr. Hauxwell says, was, that it should be a security for what the bank wanted of the uncle for the amount due upon the open account. That was the contract, though it does not appear on the promissory note. It was kept among the securities of the banking account, and according to the statement made by Mr. Hauxwell, if there was a balance due to the bank from Mr. Daniel on that account, then the promissory note was to be a guarantee for it.

This lady was married on the 13th of November. The marriage comes a short time afterwards to the knowledge of the agents of the bank. They had an agent at York, a Mr. Wilkinson, and an agent at Thirsk, Mr. Hauxwell. What communications took place immediately after the marriage we do not know: the first statement which we have relating to it is in the letter of the 26th of November 1841, in which Mr. Wilkinson directs Hauxwell to make this "a tangible security." They probably [563] were under some mistake about the effect of it; but I scarcely know, whether what they did was through mere blunder or mistake of their rights, or whether it was not an attempt to place themselves in a different position from that in which they ought to have been. We find that, after a little negotiation, and after enquiry as to the property of Mrs. Archer, Mr. Wilkinson thinks fit, on the 8th of December 1841, without any communication with Mr. and Mrs. Archer, to give this direction to Mr. Hauxwell, "enter the £500 promissory note Daniel, to his credit in the ledger and debit loans, Daniel and Kendray. Do the same in Daniel's pass-book, £500 to his credit, but date it 12th of November. You can then continue any other credits as usual. My object was to have it in the pass-book before Miss K.'s wedding, which was, I believe, on the 20th of November."

Was this the contract, that there should be £500 placed to the credit of Mr. Daniel upon the liability of Miss Kendray? If that was the contract, why was it not done at the first? What reason or pretence could there be for doing it on the 9th of December 1841, and dating it upon the 12th of November? What pretence could there be for doing it in December 1841, which did not exist upon the 2d of January 1837? Is it not an attempt to put this matter in quite a different situation from what it was before? I cannot concur in the argument, that the situation of surety is in no way altered by it. The promissory note, as I said, did not evidence the contract; there was something more than was expressed on it. The contract, according to the statement of Mr. Hauxwell, was, that the promissory note should be a security for a floating balance. Miss Kendray was answerable for a floating balance, while it remained as a floating balance, and for no more was she, at any time, [564] answerable than the floating balance amounted to. But what was the effect of entering it as a loan? It was giving an immediate credit for the sum of £500. The consequence was, that they had an immediate demand upon the note, for Daniel had the immediate benefit of the sum of £500, he had a right to draw for it all at once, and having credit for this sum, she, all at once, even without his drawing on it, might be made answerable for this note. That was not the contract, but an entire violation of it, and was made without the least authority from, and without any communication with, the Plaintiffs.

If, therefore, it were necessary to determine that question, I should have no hesitation in saying that that species of conduct vitiated and put an end to the whole transaction, and released the surety from an obligation which was made quite different from that which she had been induced to enter into.

Upon both of these grounds I am of opinion that this promissory note cannot stand, and there must be a decree for the Plaintiffs, with costs.

NOTE.—Affirmed by the Lord Chancellor on the 18th of March 1846. [15 L. J. Ch. 211.] No opinion was however given by the Lord Chancellor as to the release of the surety.

[565] HAWKINS v. WOODGATE. July 18, 1844.

The grantee of an annuity effected a policy on the life of the grantor, at his own expense. The grantor had a power of redemption on payment of £2500, and it was provided, that in case the grantor should, "at the time of making such repurchase," by notice in writing elect to take the policy, the grantee would assign to him any policy "then vested" in him, which might be effected in respect of the annuity; but it was declared, that it should not be incumbent on the grantor to keep on foot any policy. The policy became valuable, and the grantor gave the month's notice of repurchase, and declared his election to take the policy. Held, that the grantee had no right afterwards to surrender the policy for his own profit; and, semble, that although he might have let the policy drop, yet he was not, at any time, entitled to surrender it for his own profit.

In 1825 the Plaintiff granted an annuity of £365 determinable on his own life, and to which Bradford afterwards became entitled. This annuity the Plaintiff charged on certain property, and he covenanted to facilitate the grantee in effecting, at the grantee's expense, policies on his life, and to pay all extra premiums on such policies to the extent of £2500. Policies to this amount were accordingly effected by the grantee in the Sun and Crown offices.

Subsequently, in the same year, the Plaintiff granted an annuity of £442 to Hall, charged on the same property. Disputes arose, which ended in a suit in this Court, pending which, the trustees accumulated the income of the property to the amount of £4945, and the annuities were left in arrear.

An arrangement was come to between the parties, and a deed, dated in 1839, was made between Bradford (the party entitled to the first annuity) of the first part, Hall of the second part, the Plaintiff of the third part, and the trustees of the fourth part, whereby it was agreed, that the £4945 should be divided between Bradford and Hall, and that the trustees should hold the two annuities of £365 and £442, and the securities for the same (which were assigned to them by an indenture of even date), upon trust to pay an annuity of [566] £215 a year to Bradford, an annuity of £300 a year to Hall; then to pay the extra premiums payable on the said policies, or any other policies effected in lieu thereof, and then upon certain trusts for the Plaintiff. The Plaintiff thereby covenanted to attend at the insurance offices to enable Bradford, at his own cost, to keep on foot or renew the said policies, or to effect and keep on foot policies in lieu thereof, to the extent of £2500.

And it was thereby agreed, that in case the Plaintiff should be desirous to repurchase the same annuity, and should give one calendar month's notice in writing, and pay unto Bradford £2500, with all arrears of the said annuity, and costs, "and also all such extraordinary premiums, fees, and expenses, as Bradford, his executors, administrators, or assigns, should or might expend or be put unto, in or about keeping on foot, renewing, or effecting any policy or policies of insurance as aforesaid, by reason of the Plaintiff going beyond such limits as aforesaid, and which should not have been paid under the trusts of the indenture now in statement; and also the said additional gross sum of £450 thereinbefore directed to be paid to Bradford, his executors, administrators, or assigns, or so much thereof as might not have been paid under the same trusts, then and in that case, Bradford, his executors, administrators, or assigns, should and would accept and take the said sum of £2500, as and in full for the price or consideration of such repurchase of the said annuity or yearly sum of £215 thereby granted and secured; and thereupon, the said annuity or yearly sum of £215 and the several trusts, powers, and authorities thereby created and declared, so far as regarded the payment of the same annuity, should, respectively, thenceforth cease and determine; and in case the Plaintiff should, at [567] any time, repurchase the said annuity of £215 under the proviso thereinbefore contained, and the Plaintiff should, at the time of making such repurchase, by notice in writing to Bradford, his executors, administrators, or assigns, elect to take the policy or policies thereafter mentioned, but not otherwise, he Bradford should and would, at the request and expense of the Plaintiff, assign and make over any policy and policies of insurance upon the life of the Plaintiff, which might be then vested in Bradford, his executors, administrators, or assigns, and which might have been effected in respect of the said annuity of £365, or the said annuity of £215, and all benefit and advantage of the same policy or policies respectively, unto the Plaintiff, his executors, or administrators."

"Provided nevertheless, that it should not be, in any wise, incumbent on Bradford to effect, or renew, or keep on foot any such policy or policies as aforesaid, or (at any time after the completion of such repurchase as aforesaid without such election being made by the Plaintiff, as aforesaid) to assign or make over the same unto the Plaintiff, his executors, or administrators, as aforesaid."

In April 1844 the Plaintiff gave notice to the Defendants, who were the representatives of Bradford, that he intended, at the expiration of a month, to repurchase the annuity of £215, and that he elected to take the policies and would take an assignment thereof.

The policies being worth £744, the representatives of Bradford threatened to surrender them in consideration of that sum. The Plaintiff, thereupon, filed this bill to compel the Defendants, on payment of the redemption money, to assign to him the policies. The repurchase-money, and the value of the policies were [568] deposited, and it was arranged that the opinion of the Court should be taken, upon bill and answer, as to the rights of the parties in respect of the policies.

Mr. Kindersley, and Mr. Bates, for the Plaintiff, contended, that by the terms of the deed of 1839, the Defendants were precluded from defeating the right of the Plaintiff to the policies, by a surrender, after the Plaintiff had given notice to repurchase the annuity, and had declared his election to take the policies. That although the Defendants might be at liberty to allow the policies to drop, still they could not surrender them for their own profit, and that the words "at the time of making such repurchase" meant the time of giving notice.

Mr. Turner and Mr. Bacon, for the Defendants. Under the first deed, it was quite at the option of the grantee whether he would insure or not, but if he did it would be at his own expense, and the policy would have belonged to him upon the repurchase of the annuity. By the deed of 1839 the Plaintiff was relieved from a portion of the annuity, but no further benefit was intended for him than that which was expressed on the face of the deed; that deed is to be construed favourably to the grantee, who was voluntarily giving up his right to a portion of the annuity.

The intention of the parties was not to give to the Plaintiff the benefit of any outlay which the grantee might make for his own security, but to entitle him only to any policy existing at the time of the actual repurchase, and which would thereupon become useless to the grantee; this would be a convenience to the grantor, as, after the lapse of some years it might become difficult to effect a new policy on an old life.

[569] Upon the construction of the deed, it is to be observed that the clause of repurchase is dis severed from, and independent of the clause as to the policies: there is an express proviso, "that it should not be, in any wise, incumbent on Bradford, to keep on foot any such policy;" he might therefore have desisted from insuring, or might have surrendered the policy, at any time previous to the actual repurchase. The proviso is, that in case the Plaintiff should repurchase and should, "at the time of making such repurchase," elect to take the policies, then Bradford would assign any policy which might be then (namely at the time of the repurchase) vested in Bradford. So that those policies only were intended, which might be existing at the time of the actual repurchase, or of paying the repurchase-money, and there was nothing to prevent the surrender previous to that time. Mere notice was not a repurchase or payment. It created no obligation upon the Plaintiff which could be enforced; it might not have been fulfilled; and by successive notices from time to time, the Defendants might be constituted mere trustees of the policy for the Plaintiff.

If the notice created a new obligation on the Defendant, then, who was to pay the premiums during the month's notice, who was to be entitled to the benefit of the policy if it fell in during that interval, and what security was there to the Defendant for the payment of the £2500 repurchase-money, if that event had happened?

The policies were voluntarily kept up by the grantee; their value had arisen from an excess of annual outlay made by him out of his own monies. If the policies had been in the equitable, they might have exceeded the whole redemption money; and it never could have [570] been intended that the benefit of such policies, which the grantee was not bound to keep up, should belong to the grantee of the annuity who contributed nothing towards them.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] (without hearing a reply), said, I cannot think there is any doubt in this case.

A deed of arrangement seems to have been entered into between the parties, whereby an annuity was to be paid to Bradford. The Plaintiff was to afford certain facilities for effecting and continuing the policies then already effected on his life. The premiums under ordinary circumstances were to be paid by Bradford, but if any extra premiums became payable in consequence of Hawkins going out of the country, they were to be paid by him. There was to be no obligation on Bradford to keep up the policies, and then there was the clause for redemption which has been so frequently adverted to during the argument.

First, it must be admitted, that the Defendants, who represent Bradford, were under no obligation whatever to make any payment for keeping up the policies; next, it must be admitted, that Hawkins had a prospective interest in the policies, because if they were in existence at the time of the repurchase, he was entitled to have an assignment of them for his benefit.

The Plaintiff, being desirous of repurchasing, gave notice of his intention and of his election to take the policies. That notice did not alter the contract between the parties; it did not impose on the Defendants the obligation of making any further payments for keeping up the policies, but it did this; it expressed the Plaintiff's election to take the policies of insurance. The De-[571]-fendants, who, it is admitted, were not bound to make any further payments for keeping up the policies, say, that notwithstanding the prospective interest which the Plaintiff had, to have the policies assigned to him, they have a right to defeat that prospective interest, by surrendering the policies, and have also a right to receive a sum of £744, in addition to the £2500 which Bradford had agreed to accept as the consideration for the repurchase.

I am at a loss to see, upon what reasonable construction of the contract between the parties, this could be done. It does not appear to me that the Defendants had, at any time, a right to surrender the policies for a profit to themselves. They had a right to decline to keep them up, but that right is a very different thing from a right to defeat, altogether, the prospective right of the Plaintiff by an act done for their own profit.

The rights of the parties were not altered by the notice, except that the notice formed part of the transaction of repurchase, for there could not be a repurchase without notice. It was after the transaction of repurchase had commenced, that the Defendants claimed the right to surrender the policies, and put the value in their pocket. According to the Defendants' construction, the Plaintiff might have entered into arrangements for effecting the repurchase of the annuity, the instruments might have been all prepared, and at the very hour the parties had assembled to complete, they might have been told by the Defendants, "we have just surrendered the policies for our own benefit."

Admitting the Defendants to have been under no obligation to keep up the policies, I think they had not, before the notice, and I am clearly of opinion that they had not after the notice, any right by their own volun-[572]-tary act to surrender the policies for their own profit, and thus to defeat the interest of the Plaintiff, and make it impossible to carry the agreement into effect.

Thinking that there can be no reasonable doubt of the Plaintiff's right to the policies, there must be a declaration of the Plaintiff's right, and the Defendants must pay the costs of the suit.

[572] KERR v. GILLESPIE. June 12, August 3, 1844.

Letters written by a Defendant, after the institution of the suit, to an unprofessional agent abroad, "confidentially and in reference to the defence of the Defendant to this suit:" Held, not privileged.

This was a motion for the production of documents, admitted, by the Defendant's answer, to be in his possession. The Defendant, by his answer stated, that the letters appearing in the first part of the second schedule to be written by Samuel Street and Thomas C. Street, the agents of the Defendant, or either of them, to the Defendant, and to be written by the Defendant to Samuel Street and Thomas C. Street, or either of them; also the letters appearing to be written by the Defendant to his solicitors, and by the solicitors to the Defendant, were all of them so written, confidentially and in the way of business, and in reference to the defence of the Defendant to this suit. And the Defendant submitted that he was not bound to produce the same.

Messrs. Street were the agents in Canada of the Defendant, and were merchants, and not professional men. The correspondence was all subsequent to the filing of the bill.

Mr. Turner and Mr. Rogers, in support of the motion, insisted on the Plaintiff's right to have a production of [573] this correspondence, which, they argued, did not come within the rule of professional privilege, Messrs. Street being neither the professional advisers of the Defendant (see Maden v. Vevers, ante, 489), nor, as in Bunbury v. Bunbury (2 Beavan, 173), the medium of communication between the solicitor and his client.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Gordon, contra, argued that the Defendant was not bound to produce the correspondence, first, because it had taken place subsequent to the filing of the bill; and, secondly, because it had "reference to the defence of this suit," and that the Plaintiff had no right to see the Defendant's evidence. (See Preston v. Carr, 1 Y. & Jer. 175; Curling v. Perring, 2 My. & K. 380.)

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS said he would reserve the point until he had decided the case of Flight v. Robinson (8 Beav. 22).

August 3. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] (ex relations) held that the correspondence was not privileged, as the answer did not state that it had passed between the solicitor and client, or any other grounds which could relieve the Defendant from the obligation of producing it. He therefore ordered the production.

[574] LAWRENCE v. KEMPSON. June 22, 1844.

A. B. and the other committee-men of a public company mortgaged the company's estate, and covenanted personally to pay the money. They afterwards entered into a personal obligation, by bond, for another debt. A. B. died, having certain shares vested in him as trustee to the company. By the decree, the shares were ordered to be sold, and the produce applied in payment of the debts of the company, for which the estate of A. B. was liable. Held, that the representatives of A. B. had a right to have the fund applied in payment of the bond debt, in priority of the mortgage debt.

In September 1822 Peter Kempson (since deceased) and eleven other persons, who then constituted the committee of the "Birmingham Coal Company," mortgaged certain property belonging to the company to Mr. Insole for £7000, which sum they personally covenanted to pay.

In October 1822 Peter Kempson and the other members of the committee became bound, by bond, to Mr. Mather for payment of £4000.

By the decree in this cause, it was declared, that certain gas shares, which stood in the name of Peter Kempson, deceased, had been purchased by him as a trustee for the above company, and that such shares ought to be sold, and the proceeds applied towards payment of the debts and obligations due from the said company, for which the estate of the said Peter Kempson was liable.

The Master was directed to ascertain, for what debts and obligations, due from the Birmingham Coal Company, and to whom and on what securities, the estate of the said testator Peter Kempson was liable.

The Master found that the estate of Peter Kempson was liable, in conjunction with the other parties, to the above debts.

The shares were sold for £4000 and upwards.

[575] The mortgaged estate of the company was said to be sufficient to provide for the mortgage on it, and the question was, to which of the incumbrances the produce of the gas shares ought to be applied.

Mr. Turner, for the Plaintiff. Mr. Kempson and the other parties interested in the company entered into two joint securities. There is no equity, giving to the representatives of Kempson the right of selecting to which of the particular debts the produce of the gas shares ought to be applied.

Mr. Lovat, contra. The decree declares that Kempson was a trustee of the gas shares, and that they ought to be sold and applied in discharge of the debts of the company for which Kempson was liable. The intention was to indemnify Kempson's estate; but if this fund be applied in payment of the mortgage, the company's estate will be relieved, and Kempson's estate still remain liable to the bond debt. That was not the intention of the Court. The estate will provide for payment of the mortgage, and the fund ought, therefore, to be applied in discharge of the bond debt.

Mr. Turner, in reply. The representatives of Kempson are not the only parties interested in this question, the other eleven, who are represented by the Plaintiff, have a right to a voice in the application of the money.

The covenant is joint, and the bond is joint and several, so that the executors are only liable on the bond.

[576] THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I cannot think that the representatives of Kempson are in the same situation as they might have been in previous to the decree. By the decree he is declared to have been a trustee of the shares, which were directed to be sold, and the produce was to be applied in payment of the debts and obligations of the company for which the estate of Kempson was liable. A benefit was thereby intended for the representatives. The object of the Court was to indemnify the estate of Kempson, and that must be done effectually. The Plaintiff desires to apply this money in satisfaction of the debt in respect of which his estate is safe, and not in respect of that debt to which it is exposed to a greater hazard. One cannot well see that it is consistent with the decree.

It is said that Kempson was an original debtor, and that the decree directing the fund to be applied in satisfaction of these debts does not specify any priority, and that it ought to be applied in payment of that debt which the majority of the obligors select; but it appears that Kempson stood in the situation of a trustee for the company, and a peculiar protection was given to his estate by the decree, which, whether right or wrong, cannot now be varied. I think that the fund ought to be applied, first, in payment of the bond debt, and then that the residue should go in satisfaction of the mortgage.

[577] WHEATLEY v. WHEATLEY.(1) Jan. 12, 23, 1846.

The replication mentioned in the 111th of the General Orders of May 1845 means a replication in the form directed in the 93d of such orders, and therefore, in a transition case, where a subpoena to rejoin has been served prior to these orders coming into operation: Held, that publication could not pass, under the 111th Order, "without rule or order," and that a special order was necessary.

Upon a motion to dismiss, under such circumstances, the Court will (unless good cause be shewn), order that publication do then pass.

Where, prior to the orders of 1845, a replication only, in the old form, has been filed, a replication in the new form mentioned in Order 93 may be regularly filed, for the purpose of putting the cause at issue, but secus, where a subpoena to rejoin has been served prior to these New Orders.

In this case replication had been filed on the 1st of November 1844, and a subpoena to rejoin had been served on the 28th of May 1845; so that the cause was at issue before the orders of May 1845 came into operation. (28th October 1845.)

No further step having been taken in the cause,

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Steere, for the Defendant, moved to dismiss the bill for want of prosecution. They argued, that under the 111th Order of May 1845 (Ord. Can. 329), publication "passed without rule or order, at the expiration of two months, after the filing of the replication" (1st of Nov. 1844). That consequently the Defendant was entitled to dismiss, under the 114th Order, Article 4 (Ord. Can. 330), whereby such a motion may be made, if the Plaintiff "does not set down the cause to be heard, and obtain and serve a subpoena to hear judgment, within four weeks after publication has passed."

That as these orders had been promulgated so long back as May 1845, and did not come into operation until the 28th of October (3d Order, Ord. Can. 273), the Plaintiff could not therefore have been taken by surprise.

[578] Mr. James Anderson, contra. This motion is irregular on two grounds. First, Time could only run, under these orders of 1845, from the day on which they came into operation (28th Oct.), consequently, if publication could pass in this case by the operation of the 111th Order, it passed on the 23d of December 1845, and the Plaintiff, under the 114th Order, article 4, has four weeks to set down his cause. This period, excluding the Christmas Vacation, will not expire until February next. The Defendant, therefore, is premature in his motion.

Secondly. The new rules do not apply to this case. The replication referred to in the 111th Order means replication in the particular form mentioned in the 93d Order (Ord. Can. 319), by which a Plaintiff "joins issue with the Defendant;" and such seems to have been the opinion of the Vice-Chancellor of England in Lowell v. Blew (13 Simons, 492).

Mr. Kindersley, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS reserved his judgment.

Jan. 23. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. Replication having been filed on the 1st of November 1844, and a subpoena to rejoin having been served on the 28th of May 1845, and no further step having been taken in the cause, the Defendant now moves to dismiss the bill for want of prosecution. I am of opinion that the motion cannot be now granted.

(1) For the convenience of the profession, this and the nine following practice cases are published out of their regular order.

[579] The replication mentioned in the 111th Order is a replication in the form directed in the 93d Order, and no such replication having been filed, publication does not pass without rule or order. Consequently, publication has not passed in this cause, and the 4th article of the 114th Order does not entitle the Defendant to move to dismiss.

Moreover, the office and effect of a replication in the new form is, to put the cause completely at issue; it is required and may regularly be filed for the purpose of putting the cause at issue, in cases where replications only have been filed in the old form, before the 28th of October 1845. (Spencer v. Allen, 4 Hare, 455.) In those cases, it is required for the purpose of doing that which is necessary for the purpose of putting the cause at issue, but which can no longer be done by service of a subpoena to rejoin, which, under the 93d Order (Ord. Can. 319), is not to be issued.

But where the subpoena to rejoin has issued and been served before the 28th of October 1845, replication in the new form has no office to perform, and is not to be filed.

In this case, the cause is completely at issue, and the next thing to do is to pass publication, which I think ought to be by order; and unless some reason can be given why publication should not now pass, or any reasonable objection is made, I think that upon this application, I may order that publication do now pass.

After the proper time, the Defendant, if it should be necessary, may renew his motion to dismiss.

[580] BIDDULPH v. LORD CAMOYS. Jan. 23, 1846.

Service abroad of a subpoena to appear and answer directed, under the 33d Order of May 1845, upon a Defendant of unsound mind not so found by inquisition.

Two of the Defendants, Edward Henry Darell and wife, were resident in Belgium. The husband was of unsound mind, though not so found by inquisition.

Mr. J. A. Cooke moved, under the 33d General Order of May 1845 (Ord. Can. 297), for liberty to serve these Defendants with a subpoena to appear and answer.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS said he would consider whether this could be done under the order referred to.

Jan. 23. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. Two of the Defendants, husband and his wife, are resident in Belgium, and a motion is made, under the first article of the 33d Order of 8th May 1845, for leave to serve them with a subpoena to appear and answer. The evidence of residence abroad is sufficient to support the application.

But it appears, that the husband is of unsound mind, though not so found by inquisition, and the question is, whether a subpoena ought to be issued in such a case. As nothing can be done upon the service without the leave of the Court, I think that the motion ought to be granted. The order which is asked will only have the effect of placing the Defendant in the position, in which other Defendants, in the same circumstances, but resident within the jurisdiction, are placed without special order.

[581] Care should however be taken, that no application is made to enter an appearance, under the fourth article of Order 33, unless the Defendant should have recovered at the time when the subpoena is served. And I think, that in this case, that object may be sufficiently secured, by requiring the Plaintiff to undertake, that he will not apply for an order to enter an appearance for the Defendant, without producing the affidavits which have been read on this occasion.

[581] FIESKE v. BULLER. Nov. 3, 1845.

Upon an application to serve a subpoena abroad, under the 33d Order of May 1845, an affidavit merely shewing the place of residence abroad of the Defendant seven weeks previous is insufficient.

Mr. Glasse applied, under the 33d Order of May 1845 (Ord. Can. 297), for liberty to serve a subpoena abroad. The affidavit in support of the application shewed merely, that the Defendant, on the 17th of September last, was resident at Calais in France, and that it was probable he was still there; but no further information was furnished as to his subsequent residence.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] said there appeared to have been no communication with the Defendant during the last seven weeks, and he therefore thought, that the affidavit was not sufficient to shew the present residence of the Defendant. That the motion might however stand over to supply the defect.

[582] BROWN v. STANTON. Nov. 3, 1845.

Liberty being given under the 33d Order of May 1845 to serve a subpoena in Ireland, the periods limited under the 2d Article were ten days to appear, six weeks to plead, answer, or demur, not demurring alone, but no order was made as to the time for demurring alone.

Mr. Amphlett applied, under the 33d Order of May 1845 (Ord. Can. 297), for liberty to serve a subpoena upon the Defendant in Ireland.

The affidavit in support of the motion stated positively, upon the belief of the deponent, that the Defendant was now in or near Limerick.

He asked that the Court would limit, under Article 2, the time "after service of subpoena within which such Defendant was to plead, answer, or demur," and he also asked that a time might be limited for demurring alone.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] said that the Defendant ought to have ten days after the service of the subpoena to appear, and six weeks after appearance to plead, answer, or demur, not demurring alone; but he said it was not necessary to fix any time for demurring alone, which would be twelve days (16th Order of May 1845, Art. 10; Ord. Can. 280), according to the usual practice.

NOTE.—In Preston v. Dickinson, Sir J. L. Knight Bruce, on the application of Mr. Headlam, gave liberty to serve the Defendant within the Grand Duchy of Baden, and limited the time for appearance, and for pleading, answering, and demurring, not demurring alone. In drawing up the order, a question arose, whether the following paragraph should be inserted, "But in case the said Defendant should be advised to demur alone, he is to do so within twelve days after such appearance," and also whether the form of subpoena mentioned in the orders of May 1845 ought to be varied in conformity, under the 24th Order of May 1845. (Ord. Can. 293.) The Lord Chancellor was applied to, and a communication was had with the Master [583] of the Rolls, who expressed himself as follows:—"The order as originally made by the Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce is perfectly correct, and it is quite unnecessary to specify a limited time for demurring alone, or to make any alteration in the form of the subpoena, under the authority given by Order 24."

The order and subpoena were thereupon directed to be prepared in conformity with this opinion.

[583] MOORE v. PLATEL. Nov. 13, 1845.

On an application to appoint a solicitor guardian ad litem, to a Defendant of unsound mind, not so found by inquisition, the Court required to be first satisfied that no relative would undertake the defence.

Mr. Turner moved, under the 32d Order of May 1845 (Ord. Can. 296), for an order appointing one of the solicitors of the Court guardian ad litem of a Defendant of unsound mind, not so found by inquisition.

It was stated, that the Defendant had, for some time, been resident with a Mr. Snow, and that application had been made to the solicitors of the other Defendants to undertake his defence, but that they had refused.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The object of the Court is to see how this Defendant may be best protected. You have only applied to the solicitor of the other Defendants, who has refused; but it is not stated whether any application has been made to the relatives, or whether they will undertake the protection of this Defendant's interests. If they will not, I shall appoint Mr. Johnson, the solicitor of the Sutors' Fund, to be guardian; but I do not wish to do so until I am satisfied that no natural protector will undertake his defence.

The matter had better stand over for a further affidavit.

[584] HUGHES v. THOMAS. Nov. 23, 1845.

Exceptions were shewn as cause on the day they were filed. Held, that they might be referred instantly, notwithstanding the 16th Order of May 1845, Art. 25.

This was an injunction case. The Plaintiff obtained the common injunction for want of answer, which, however, was afterwards filed.

On the 20th of November the Plaintiff excepted thereto for insufficiency, and on the same day, upon a motion before Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce to dissolve the injunction, the exceptions were shewn as cause. It was then proposed to refer the exceptions instantly; but a question arose whether this could be done, since the 16th General Order of May 1845, Art. 25, which prohibits the Plaintiff referring exceptions for insufficiency until the expiration of eight days from the filing of such exceptions.(1)

The senior registrar, by the direction of His Honour the Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce, applied to the Master of the Rolls. (2 Colly. 239.)

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] expressed the following opinion.

"The Plaintiff having filed exceptions for insufficiency is not without special leave to procure an order to refer them within eight days. Order 16, Art. 25.(1) [585] "But in an injunction cause, if the Defendant obtain an order nisi to dissolve the injunction, the Plaintiff may shew his exceptions as cause against making the order nisi absolute.

"He does not ask for a reference, but insists on his exceptions as good cause; and, thereupon, the Court, under the general practice and to avoid giving unjust credit to the exceptions, makes the reference mero motu, or at the request of the Defendant, and, to avoid unnecessary delay, imposes upon the Plaintiff the condition of obtaining the report in four days. So much of this practice as relates to time is stated in Art. 28: the rest is founded on the old practice,(2) which is not altered even as to time, although in an attempt to collect together the dispersed regulations as to time, it was thought right to mention this particular regulation as to time here."

[586] HORRY v. CALDER. Dec. 4, 1845.

Bill filed in July, application on the 4th of December for leave to serve copy bill. Motion refused on account of the unexplained delay.

Mr. Allnutt moved, under the 28th Order of May 1845 (Ord. Can. 294, and see 23d Order of August 1841, Ord. Can. 171), for liberty to serve a copy of the bill on a Defendant, after the expiration of the twelve weeks. The amended bill had been filed in July, but no affidavit was produced in support of the application.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. After this unexplained delay I must refuse the motion.

[586] DALTON v. HAYTER. Nov. 3, 1845.

The words "last of the answers" in the 114th Order of May 1845 means the last answer of any one of several Defendants, so that the right of one Defendant to move to dismiss for want of prosecution is not delayed by his Co-defendant's neglect to answer.

The expressions "the last answer," and "the last of several answers" in the 66th Order, and in the 16th Order, Art. 33, means the last of the several answers filed by several Defendants.

This was a motion to dismiss the bill for want of prosecution under the 114th of the General Orders of May 1845. (Ord. Can. 330.) The bill was filed in 1843 against several Defendants, and afterwards, by amendment, Mr. B. was made a party. Mr. B. filed his answer, which became sufficient on the 18th of April 1845, and some of the other Defendants filed their answer on the following day. The Plaintiff took no subsequent proceeding in the cause. Mrs. Moody, one of the Defendants, had not answered; it was stated that she had gone abroad since appearance, but it was not shewn that any attempt had been made to get in her answer. It was now moved on behalf of Mr. B. that the bill might be dismissed for want of prosecution, under the 114th Order of May 1845.

Mr. Beavan, in support of the motion. By the 114th General Order of May 1845 (Ord. Can. 330), any Defendant may move to dismiss, and the Court may order accordingly, if a Plaintiff does not file a replication within four weeks after the answer, or the last of the answers is found or deemed sufficient, and the question depends on the true construction of this order. The words "last of the answers" have reference to the antecedent expression "any Defendant," and mean the last answer of "any" such Defendant; as if a Defendant put in a further [587] answer, or an answer to an amended bill, then four weeks after such last answer he could move to dismiss.

Secondly; if this be not the true construction, then the last words "last of the answers" mean the last of the answers which have then been filed; otherwise the Plaintiff, by omitting due diligence to get in an answer, or by adding a friendly Defendant, might, for ever, prevent a dismissal for want of prosecution. Besides this, some of the Defendants may never answer at all, for the Plaintiff may file a "traversing note," or the bill may be taken pro confesso without an answer, in which case the General Order would never apply. According to this construction the last of the answers put in was filed on the 19th of April, and became sufficient on the 28th of May, and the four weeks expired on the 25th of June, after which this Defendant was at liberty to move to dismiss.

Thirdly; Mrs. Moody being out of the jurisdiction, is not a Defendant within this order? In the case of The King of Spain v. Hullett (1 Russ. & M. 7), a Defendant out of the jurisdiction was considered not to be a Defendant within the meaning of the 13th Order of 1830. (Ord. Can. 8.) So in Cooke v. Betham (1 C. P. Cooper, 403) and Bradstock v. Whatley (Rolls, 28th February 1844, unreported), a Defendant not served with a subpoena was held not to be a Defendant within the same 13th Order; requiring an order to amend to be obtained within six weeks after the last of the answers, if there be two or more Defendants, is to be deemed sufficient.

Mr. Greene, contra. This motion is premature. The 114th Order is, in its terms, permissive, and the De-[588]-fendant is entitled to move to dismiss after the lapse of four weeks after "the last of the answers" is sufficient. The expression "last of the answers" can only mean the last answer of all the Defendants who are required to answer, and here there is a Defendant whose answer is not yet put in. This construction might, I admit, give rise to abuse, but none is here suggested, and the Court can prevent abuse of the order when it is attempted; the clear meaning of the words of the order, there being nothing in the context to qualify last answer of several Defendants answering. This is more consistent with the rest of the orders, and it must be observed especially that the Plaintiff is now required by the 93d (Ord. Can. 319) Order to file but one replication, and he must do this after the last answer of several Defendants comes in.

Again, the 118th (Ord. Can. 332) Order is in its terms negative, and "a Defendant is not to be at liberty to move to dismiss for want of prosecution, until after the expiration of the time within which a Plaintiff may obtain an order to amend such bill," and reverting to the 66th Order (Ord. Can. 308), we find that he is entitled to an order to amend within four weeks after "the last of several answers is to be deemed sufficient," and Articles 32, 33 (Ord. Can. 287), and 37 (Ord. Can. 286) of Order 16, contrasted, shew clearly, that this means the last answer of several Defendants, and afford the true explanation of "the last answer" throughout these orders; therefore, the time to amend has not elapsed. It is to be further observed, that the words "as to such Defendant" contained in the 26th Order of 1833 (Ord. Can. 52) are omitted in the 118th Order of May 1845. (Ord. Can. 332.) This [589] shews an intention that the last answer was not to have reference to the Defendant moving.

It is then said, that the words "last of the answers" in the 114th Order (Ord. Can. 330) means the last of the answers which may have been filed at the time of moving. [THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. You need not trouble yourself on that point, for I am not of that opinion.]

As to the third point, the cases do not apply. Here Mrs. Moody was not out of the jurisdiction at the time the bill was filed, but process was prayed against her in ordinary course, and she has appeared. In The King of Spain v. Hullett, and in Cooke v. Betham, and Bradstock v. Whalley, the Defendant had not appeared or been served with a subpoena, as in the present case.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale], without hearing a reply, said: It has been contended that the right of a party to move to dismiss a bill for want of prosecution depends on the conduct of his Co-defendant, who is no way under his control. It would be singular if that were so, and upon a full consideration of these orders, I do not find that they admit of any such construction.

In the Order 114, Art. 1 (Ord. Can. 330), the expression "the answer or the last of the answers" is applicable to the case of any one Defendant, who has filed one or more answers to an original or amended bill; and it means the answer or last answer of any Defendant claiming a right to move to dismiss the bill.

But the time when the motion may be made is not independent of other orders. Thus, Order 118 (Ord. Can. 332) [590] directs, that a Defendant is not to move to dismiss until after the expiration of the time within which the Plaintiff may obtain an order to amend his bill; and the time within which the Plaintiff may obtain an order to amend depends upon Order 66 (Ord. Can. 308), as affected by Order 14. (Ord. Can. 276.)

You are not usually to impute to one Defendant a knowledge of that which has been done by his Co-defendants, and therefore, when the time for obtaining an order to amend has elapsed, as far as depends on the case of any Defendant, that Defendant may under Order 118 (Ord. Can. 332), move to dismiss.

But the expressions "the last answer," and "the last of several answers" in Orders 66 (Ord. Can. 308), and 16, Art. 33 (Ord. Can. 287), clearly mean the last of the several answers filed by several Defendants, or by more than one Defendant; and pending the time appointed by these orders, as affected by Order 14 (Ord. Can. 276), the Plaintiff is entitled to obtain an order to amend.

And the consequence is, that, although a particular Defendant may be entitled to move to dismiss under Order 114, Art. 1 (Ord. Can. 330), and Order 118 (Ord. Can. 332), the Court may not think it right to make an order according to the motion. The Plaintiff may not have been able to proceed effectually against some other Defendant, or the Court may think the case such as to justify or excuse some delay.

[591] In any such case the Court may, under Order 21 (Ord. Can. 292), give to the Plaintiff time, upon such conditions and on such terms as may be thought just and reasonable.

In this case, I am of opinion, that the Defendant's motion is made with perfect regularity; but, considering the circumstances, (1) the motion must stand over until the appeal before the Lord Chancellor has been disposed of.

[591] TOTTY v. INGLEBY. Dec. 4, 1845.

Subpoena to appear to bill of revivor served on the 3d July, and an application made on the 4th of December to enter appearance for Defendant. Held, that the Plaintiff must either serve a new subpoena or give notice of motion.

Mr. Bayley moved under the 29th Order of May 1845 (Ord. Can. 294), after the expiration of the three weeks mentioned in that order, for liberty to enter an appearance for a Defendant to a bill of revivor. The subpoena had been served on the 3d of July. No explanation was given of the cause of the delay in making the application; but he argued that, as under the 62d Order (Ord. Can. 307), no order to revive could be made, without an application to the Court on notice, no prejudice could result to the Defendant.

[592] THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale], however, said that too long a period had elapsed since the service, and, therefore, the Plaintiff must either serve a new subpoena, or give notice of motion.

[592] BELL v. HASTINGS. Dec. 4, 10, 1845.

Liberty given, after great delay, to serve copy bill, the omission to apply earlier having been accidental, and not for delay.

Mr. Prior moved under the 28th Order of May 1845 (Ord. Can. 294), for liberty to serve a copy of the amended bill on a Defendant, after the expiration of the twelve weeks mentioned in that order. The amended bill had been filed on the 14th of April 1845.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I cannot grant this application without being satisfied that there is no intention to delay the prosecution of this suit. This proceeding may possibly delay the proceedings as against all the other Defendants. You must shew your application is bonâ fide, and not for delay.

Dec. 10. Mr. Prior now stated, that he had an affidavit that the omission to apply had been accidental, and not for the purpose of delay: that the interrogatories had been settled by counsel; and that it was the Plaintiff's intention to prosecute the suit without delay.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. Take the order.

[593] THE SKINNERS' COMPANY v. THE IRISH SOCIETY. (2) Feb. 9, 10, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, Nov. 19, 1838.

[S. C. 12 CL. & F. 425; 8 E. R. 1474.]

The Irish Society held to be trustees for public purposes, and not accountable to the companies of London, notwithstanding the latter were, after providing for the public objects, entitled to the surplus revenues of the estates vested in the former.

After some negotiation, an agreement was entered into between King James I. and the City of London, for the grant by the former to the latter of a large tract of land in Ireland, to be colonized by English. It was stipulated that £20,000 should be advanced to be expended in the undertaking, that certain houses should be built, &c. The city compulsorily levied the amount upon the city companies. In 1613 King James granted a charter creating a corporation (the Irish Society), the members of which were to be appointed by the city, for the management of the plantation, to whom the land was thereby granted, but no trusts were declared. The principal part of the lands were afterwards divided in severalty between the companies, but the town lands, fishings, &c., were retained by the Irish Society, who, after applying a considerable portion towards public purposes, such as building churches, schools, &c., divided the residue amongst the companies. The Irish Society having annually divided a considerable sum amongst its members and made large expenditures in tavern expences, and in other modes which were objected to, a bill was filed by one of the companies against the society, the City of London, and the Attorney-General, to correct the alleged abuses; but it was held, that the powers granted to the society and the trusts reposed in them were, in part, of a general and public nature, independent of the private benefit of the companies: that the companies, though interested in any surplus which might remain after the general purposes were answered, were not entitled to control the exercise of the powers given for general and public purposes, and that the Court had not jurisdiction, upon the application of the companies, to determine upon the propriety of the expenditure made, though the discretion might be controlled elsewhere and in another manner. The bill was dismissed with costs.

(1) The Defendant had filed a demurrer to the bill which had been overruled. He applied for a stay of the proceedings pending the appeal, which having failed, the Plaintiff took immediate steps to compel the Defendant to proceed to put in his answer. The appeal on the demurrer had not been disposed of, but stood high in the paper.

(2) This case was affirmed by the House of Lords on the 8th of August 1845, and is now reported in consequence of its public importance.

Allegations and admissions, used for the purpose of defence against attempted extortion, under the form of legal proceedings, or for the purpose of obtaining justice irregularly when regularly it could not be had, ought not to be used as evidence of the rights of the parties. Held, consequently, that allegations and admissions, made in the course of arbitrary proceedings against parties in the Star Chamber, and in a treaty for compromise which arose out of the sentence, and in the proceedings which took place before the House of Commons in an attempt to obtain relief from the oppression of that Court, could not in any way influence the judgment of this Court.

This case, which was formerly before the Court upon an interlocutory application (1 Myl. & Cr. 162), now came on for hearing.

[594] The bill was filed against the Irish Society (a corporate body), against forty of the trading companies of the City of London, and the Attorney-General, seeking a declaration, that the Plaintiffs and the other city companies were entitled to the Irish property in dispute: that the Irish Society were trustees for them and for an account, &c.

The outline of this case (a more complete statement of which will be found in the judgment of the Master of the Rolls (post, p. 602)) is as follows:—

In the year 1608, the principal part of the province of Ulster, in Ireland, had, by the attainder of the Roman Catholics involved in the recent rebellion, become forfeited and vested in the Crown. King James I., being desirous of colonizing it with his Protestant subjects, proposed to grant out the land to persons willing to undertake the work of colonization, upon terms contained in a printed "collection of orders and conditions" published by his authority. This document first stated the object the King had in view as follows:—That His Majesty "not respecting his own profit, but the public peace and welfare" of Ireland, by the civil plantation of those unreformed and waste countries, was pleased to distribute the escheated lands to such of his subjects as should seek the same, "with a mind not only to benefit themselves, but to do service to the Crown and Commonwealth." It then provided that the undertakers were to build fortresses, keep and furnish arms and men for the defence of the settlement, erect houses, form townships, take the oath of supremacy, plant a competent number of English and Scottish tenants; and it also provided for the foundation of market towns and corpor[595]-ations for the habitation and settling of tradesmen and artificers, and for free schools, parishes, churches, &c., &c.

Commissioners were appointed by the Crown, and on the 21st of July 1609 instructions given to them as to the mode in which the objects of the Crown were to be effected. The King, being desirous of engaging the citizens of London in this work, and to induce them to become undertakers of the colonization of a large tract of the escheated lands, caused to be prepared a document, setting forth the "motives and reasons" to induce the city to engage therein. It specified the "fittest places for the City of London to plant," and which the King proposed to grant, the land, sea and river, "commodities" which it produced, and "the profits which London should receive by this plantation," by the advancement of trade, the employment of its superabundant population, &c., "to the great service of the King, the strength of his realm, and the advancement of several trades and benefit of particular persons."

This proposal seemed to have undergone much consideration on the part of the City of London. (1) A committee was appointed for investigating the matter, who by a report, dated the 15th of December 1609, recommended, first, that £15,000 should be expended, to be raised by way of companies of the city "by the poll according to the rate of corn set upon every company" (2); secondly, they specified the territory (about 23,000 acres in Coleraine), and privileges to be demanded, and the position in which [596] the cities of Derry and Coleraine were to be built; thirdly, the things to be performed by the undertakers; and, fourthly, with respect to the management, they recommended the constitution of a company in London by whose advice and direction all things concerning the plantation and undertaking were to be managed. This report, forming the basis of a proposal, being communicated to the Privy Council, was, with some variations, accepted. By articles of agreement, dated the 28th of January 1609-10, made between the Privy Council on behalf of the King on the one part, and "the committees appointed by Act of Common Council on behalf of the Mayor and Commonalty of the City of London on the other," "it was agreed by the city that the sum of £20,000 should be levied:" it provided for the building by the city of the Cities of Derry and Coleraine, and maintaining the Castle of Culmore, and specified the lands and privileges to be granted, and on what terms and conditions. This agreement was confirmed by the city by Act of Common Council of the 30th of January 1609, which enacted, "that for the better ordering, directing, and effecting of all things touching and concerning the said plantation, and the business thereunto belonging, there should be a company constituted" within the city, consisting of a governor, deputy, and twenty-four assistants, who were empowered to determine "what should be done or performed on behalf of this city touching or concerning the said plantation," &c., &c.

Possession of the lands was shortly after given, and the corporation, who then exercised a right of compulsorily taxing the companies, directed the £20,000 to be raised by the several companies, according to the assessment; other large sums were subsequently raised in like manner and for the same purpose. In 1610, it was proposed by the city that the companies should take a proportion of the lands in lieu of the [597] money disbursed by them, to be planted at their own costs, and they were informed that, whether they accepted the offer or not, they would be liable for the charges of the buildings, fortifications, and also "that, notwithstanding the acceptance of the lands, they should likewise be partakers of all benefits of fishings, with the profits of towns and other immunities. This was generally acceded to by the companies, and subsequently the commissioners appointed by the city made their report, dated 15th of October 1613, stating that they had divided the lands, but that a division of the towns and town lands, ferries, and fisheries could not be fitly made, but that the rents and profits of them might be divided and go amongst the several companies." The report was approved and a division directed.

On the 29th of March 1613 King James I. granted his charter, whereby he incorporated the Irish Society, and he granted to it the lands undertaken, but no specific trust was thereby declared. The Irish Society were thereby empowered to determine all matters concerning the plantation, &c. (see post, p. 619), and the members were to be appointed and removable by the city.

In 1615 King James I. granted to the companies licences to hold in mortmain;

(1) Throughout this case the distinction between the Corporation of the City of London and the several corporate companies must be carefully borne in mind.

(2) That is, according to an assessment called the corn rate, by which the companies were respectively compellable to furnish a given quantity of corn for the city granaries.

and in 1617 the Irish Society, in pursuance of the prior agreement, conveyed to the several companies their allotment of the lands, to be held by them in severalty. The Irish Society reserved the town lands, ferries, fisheries, and timber, the rents of which formed the subject of this suit. After the death of James I., some questions arose respecting the validity of the charter; arbitrary proceedings were adopted by King Charles I. in the Star Chamber, against the City of London, the Irish Society, and the com-[598]-panies. That Court decreed a repeal of the charter, and imposed a fine of £70,000 on the city and the Irish Society. A complaint was made to the House of Commons, who resolved that the proceeding was illegal. A promise was made to restore the charter, but in consequence of the Civil War, this was not done till 1662, when Charles II. granted a new charter similar, with some variations, to the former. After the granting of the new charter, the Irish Society again executed conveyances of the respective allotments of the lands to the different companies. From that time, the different companies held their lands in severalty, and the Irish Society retained the town lands, ferries, and fisheries. They applied a considerable portion in public purposes, such as in building and repairing churches and chapels, in public schools, in paying schoolmasters, in building bridges and fortifications, and in a variety of other public objects, and they divided the surplus amongst the city companies.

The Skinners' Company having become dissatisfied with the modern expenditure, filed this bill, charging breaches of trust and mismanagement on the part of the Irish Society. It appeared that, on the average of the last eight years, the net rental was about £10,000 a year, of which there was divided amongst the companies no more than £2000 a year. The average amount expended by the company for their tavern expenses and entertainments, amounted to £474, and they divided amongst themselves for attendance money, about £425 a year. The other prominent items of expenditure objected to were as follows:—An annual contribution of £56, 17s. 6d. for the Derry Race Plate, a like sum for Colonel Ponsonby's monument, payments of £683, 2s. 2d., and £2224, 9s. 0d. in respect of the Coleraine election, and payment of large sums in tavern expenses, gratuities, and fees to the members of the Irish Society. The [599] following table will shew the rental and the application thereof for three years immediately before the filing of the bill:—

Several documents were produced in evidence, in which, in 1683, 1713, 1715, and 1789, the Irish Society had stated that they were "trustees" for the London companies, and like admissions had been made by the City of London. Thus in their defence to the proceedings in the Star Chamber, the city insisted, that they "had nothing to do with the said plantation, and that their names were used, merely for the transaction of affairs, [800] and for levying and raising of money for the said plantation, upon the companies of the city, which could not be done but by Act of Common Council." This defence was, however, overruled by the Court, the negotiation, agreement, &c., having been with the city. The city made a similar statement in the petition to the House of Commons, in 1641. In a petition to King Charles I. they stated, that the grant of the lands "was in trust for the several companies of London and the particular men who disbursed the monies towards the plantation;" and in a report of a Committee of Inquiry appointed by the Court of Aldermen, it was stated, that the lands, fishings, and customs, had been granted unto the Irish Society, for the use of the several companies of London who were at the charge of building, &c.

The cause now came on for hearing.

Sir W. W. Follett (Attorney-General), Mr. Wigram, and Mr. Lloyd, for the Plaintiffs, contended that the Irish Society were mere trustees for the city companies, who had furnished the means for making the plantation, and that they had repeatedly admitted themselves to be such. That the public purposes contemplated by the charters had now been fully performed, by the building of the houses, the settlement of the plantation, &c., and that the rents of the reserved lands, &c., belonged to the companies. That the society had been guilty of clear breaches of trust, by the application of the funds to the private purposes of the individual members, and in other improper modes, and that this Court, in the exercise of its ordinary jurisdiction, would, by its decree, adopt measures to prevent the future misapplication of the income of the property.

[801] Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Wood, for the Irish Society, insisted, that they were a political body invested by the Crown with important public trusts and large discretionary powers, like those given upon the formation of plantations in America, for the benefit of the plantation in connection with the City of London, and for the benefit of the citizens at large. That constant usage, the absolute dominion exercised by the society over the company as well as over the income of the property, and the absence of all interference by the companies shewed that the society did not stand in the relation of trustees to the company: that if they had conducted themselves improperly, they were answerable only to the Crown. That the Corporation of London had the power of affording redress, and of removing the members of the society; and that the Plaintiffs had no rights capable of being enforced by bill in equity.

Sir C. Wetherell, the Hon. C. E. Law (the Recorder), and Mr. Randell, for the City of London, joined in resisting the claim of the Plaintiffs, contending, that by the charter, a trust had been created for general public purposes; that the corporation had delegated to them a supreme visitatorial power and control, which this Court ought not to interfere with; and that, though the Crown, by information or other proceedings, might interfere with the management of the Irish Society, still the companies could not sustain a private suit for that purpose.

Sir R. M. Rolfe (Solicitor-General) and Mr. Wray, for the Crown, insisted that the rents of the reserved portion were wholly or primarily devoted to, and ought to be applied in furtherance of, the general public objects of the plantation; that the Crown had delegated to the Irish Society a discretionary power, which this Court had no jurisdiction to control.

[602] Mr. Pemberton, Mr. Romilly, Mr. Walker, Mr. J. Russell, Mr. S. Sharpe, Mr. Clarke, Mr. Teed, Mr. Jeremy, Mr. Whitmarsh, Mr. Rogers, Mr. Hayter, Mr. Freeling, Mr. Baily, and Mr. Lovat, for other Defendants.

Nov. 19. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The Plaintiffs in this cause are the Company of the Skinners of the City of London; the Defendants are the Society of the Governor and Assistants, London, of the New Plantation in Ulster, within the realm of Ireland, who are usually called the Irish Society, the Company of Mercers, and about forty other companies of the City of London, John Thomas Thorpe, Henry Schultes, and Her Majesty's Attorney-General.

The Irish Society is a corporate body, possessed of and entitled to certain ferries, fisheries, and town lands in Ireland, and the bill prays, that it may be declared that the Plaintiffs and the other companies who contributed to the expenses of the new plantation in Ulster, are beneficially entitled to the rents and profits of the said ferries, fisheries, and town lands, subject only to certain payments and charges, and that the Irish [603] Society are trustees of the same rents and profits, so subject, for the Plaintiffs and the other companies. The bill further prays for an account of such rents and profits, and for a partition of the ferries, fisheries, and town lands, between the Plaintiffs and the other companies, or (if such partition ought not to be made) for the removal of the Irish Society from being such trustees, and that other trustees may be appointed; or that some other arrangement may be made, for securing to the Plaintiffs and the other companies the due payment of their respective shares of the said rents and profits: the bill also prays for a receiver and injunction, and for further relief.

There are four distinct parties whose interests or claims have been brought into question. First. The companies of the City of London, for whom the Plaintiffs insist that the Irish Society are mere trustees, bound to account to them, and without any right or discretionary power to apply any part of the income of the property vested in them, for any public, charitable, or other purpose.

Secondly. The Irish Society who admit that they have no beneficial interest in the property, and that they are trustees for the companies of any surplus which may remain after answering certain public purposes, but claim to have a discretionary power to apply so much of the income as they may think fit for those public purposes, without being liable to account for the same to the companies.

Thirdly. The City of London, who resist the claim of the Plaintiffs, and claim for themselves a species of visitatorial or superintending power, enabling them to control the conduct and proceedings of the Irish Society; and, [604] Fourthly. The Attorney-General, who, on behalf of the Crown, suggests that the rents and profits are applicable to public purposes.

As nothing can be determined as between Co-defendants on the present occasion, the substantial question in the cause is, whether the Irish Society has, independently of the companies and without being subject to account to them, a discretionary power to apply any part of the rents and profits of the estates vested in them, for purposes which they deem beneficial to the public, with reference to the plantation in Ireland which is mentioned in the pleadings. The Irish Society may be answerable to the City of London, or to the companies as represented or protected by the City of London, or to the Crown; yet, if it is not answerable to the companies severally, in this Court, the Plaintiffs are not entitled to the relief which they ask by this bill. On the other hand, if the society had no such discretionary power as they claim, and are, as trustees, answerable to the companies, severally, for all their receipts and payments, the Plaintiffs are entitled to relief; their right has been denied, and accounts have been refused to them.

The Irish Society now subsists under a charter of King Charles II., dated the 10th April 1662: that charter was principally, and as to most of its details, founded on a former charter granted by King James I. on the 29th March 1613, and from the mode in which the case was stated and argued on all sides, it appears to me necessary to consider the circumstances under which the first charter was granted, so far as those circumstances are proved by the evidence in the cause. From the evidence it appears, that in the year 1608, the greatest part of the six several counties of Armagh, Tyrone, Coleraine, Donegal, Fermanagh and Cavan, had, by escheat or forfeiture, come into the possession of the Crown, [605] and that King James I., being desirous to promote the public peace and welfare of Ireland by a civil plantation of what were called "those unreformed and waste countries," proposed to induce English and Scotch persons to emigrate thither, and undertake the plantation on certain terms; and for that purpose, he caused to be published a collection of such "orders and conditions" as were to be observed by the undertakers, upon the distribution and plantation of the lands.

It is plain from these "orders and conditions," that the King did not merely contemplate the benefit of the persons who should undertake the plantation, or "colony" as it is called in another document, but that he had a great public object in view, and to carry that into effect, desired to engage such of his subjects, as well of Great Britain as of Ireland, as, "being of merit and ability, should seek the lands, with a mind not only to benefit themselves, but to do service to the Crown and Commonwealth." It was intended to appoint commissioners for setting forth the several proportions of the lands, and for the ordering and settling the plantation, according to such instructions as should be given unto them by His Majesty in that behalf. Such commissioners were appointed, and instructions given to them on the 21st July 1609; but before that time, the King became desirous to engage the City of London in the undertaking, and caused to be prepared a paper, setting forth "motives and reasons to induce the City of London to undertake the plantation in the north of Ireland." These "motives and reasons" (after suggesting that the ruined City of Derry, and another place at or near the Castle of Coleraine, seemed to be the fittest places for the City of London to plant, and that the situation was such, that the same, especially the Derry, might be made by land almost impregnable), set forth, that His Majesty might be pleased to grant unto those towns, not only corporations with such liberties and privileges for their good [606] government, &c., as might be convenient, but also the whole territory and country between them, which was above twenty miles in length, bounded by the sea on the north, the river Bann on the east, and the river of Derry or Lough Foyle on the west; out of which, 1000 acres more might be allotted to each of the towns for their commons, rent free; the rest to be planted with such undertakers as the City of London should think good for their best profit, paying only for the same the easy rent of the undertakers. The "motives and reasons" further set forth, that His Majesty might be pleased to grant to those towns the benefit of all the customs of imports and exports for twenty-one years, paying only a yearly rent of 6s. 8d., and would be pleased to buy the salmon fishing in the rivers of Bann and Lough Foyle, and bestow the same on the towns for their better encouragement; and likewise to grant them licences to transport all prohibited wares growing on their own lands, and the admiralty on the coasts of Tyreconnell and Coleraine; and then were specified "the land commodities" which the north of Ireland produced, "the sea commodities," and "the profits which London should receive by the plantation;" and the profits which were described were of a public nature, affecting the general welfare of the city.

These "motives and reasons" were intended to be, and afterwards became, the subject of conference between certain persons authorized to act for the city, and certain members of the King's Council, and precepts were issued by the Lord Mayor to induce the companies of the City of London to appoint persons to act for them; and the first answer having been given and disliked, because given before any conference had with the King's Council for Ireland, persons were afterwards appointed committees for such conference by the city, and such committees "had (as is stated in the precept dated the 24th of July 1609), re-[607]-ceived such satisfaction, as well of the honour of the action and the good that might come to the kingdom and city by the same, as the profit that was likely to redound to particular adventures as had given good encouragement to the committee and others to become adventurers therein, and liberty was also given for further satisfaction, that all things should be answerable to that which was reported, that certain men should be chosen and sent by the city to view the place, and make return to the city, so that, if it proved not answerable to that which was reported, and profitable for the undertakers, the city might be at liberty to leave the undertaking, anything then done notwithstanding." Under these circumstances, the Court of Aldermen ordered precepts to be sent to the several companies of the city, requiring them to call their companies together, to understand what every particular man would willingly adventure to the same, so that the committees might be fully instructed to give answer to the Council of Ireland on Friday then next, the 28th.

Precepts were accordingly issued. It does not appear, however, that this course was pursued; for an order of the Court of Common Council, dated the 1st of August following, was made, which, without taking notice of any willing adventurers, or any offers of contribution, recites, that the Privy Council had, theretofore, signified His Majesty's pleasure to divers aldermen and commoners concerning the intended plantation, and that divers aldermen and commoners, elected by that Court, had had conference with the Council for Ireland about the same, and then proceeded as follows:—"It is this day, therefore, upon the motion and commandment of the Lords of His Majesty's Privy Council, signified to divers aldermen and commoners of this city, upon Sunday last (the 30th July), at the council table, concluded and agreed, that four wise, grave, and discreet [608] citizens of this city, should be presently sent to view the place for the intended plantation in Ireland," and it was thereupon ordered, that four persons therein named, John Broad, Hugh Hammersley, Robert Treswell and John Rowley, "should forthwith, at the city's charges, undertake the voyage into Ireland, and survey and view the place and grounds intended for the new plantation there, and make report to the city, at their return from thence, of their opinion and doings touching the same." The persons appointed to be viewers received from the city £300 for their expenses, and then proceeded on their mission to Ireland.

It appears, therefore, that at this time, the King's Government was in treaty with the City of London, to undertake some portion of his plantation, and that the city, before entering into any engagement, proceeded, by commissioners or agents of their own and at their own expence, to ascertain the facts necessary for their consideration.

By an order of the Court of Aldermen, dated 28th November 1609, it appears that the commissioners had then returned and made their report, and an additional sum of £100 was ordered to be paid to them, and on 2d December 1609 the Court of Common Council, after noticing that the Lords of the Council expected presently to hear the resolution of the city touching the plantation, it was ordered, that Sir Stephen Soame and others, "calling unto them the four commissioners or viewers, should meet together, to advise and consider of all circumstances and matters fit to be remembered about the plantation," and they were to be ready to make report to the next Common Council, in writing, of their opinions touching the same, "Whereby the city's resolute answer concerning the said intended plantation might be made and delivered to the Lords of the Council" the 16th of December next.

[609] On the 15th of December the report of the committee was made, and it recommended, in substance, that the sum of money to be expended should only be £15,000, and that the same should be raised by way of companies, and in companies by the poll, according to the rate of corn set upon every company; but some of the inferior companies were thought fit to be spared; yet that such as were known able men in those companies should set proportionably with men of like ability in other companies; and for this levy it was proposed, that an Act should be passed in the Court of Common Council.

After this statement as to the sum and the mode of raising it, the committee claimed, that the Derry and the town of Coleraine should be the places where two cities should be erected; that unto Derry 4000, and unto Coleraine 3000 acres of land should be laid, and that the rest of the territory and county of Coleraine, estimated at 16,000 acres of temporal lands, should be undertaken. Various privileges, varying from those mentioned in the first project, were proposed to be claimed, and it was suggested, that, seven years' time should be asked for, "to make such other reasonable demands, as time should shew to be needful but could not presently be foreseen." The report then stated what was proposed to be done, and finally suggested, that all things should be managed and ruled as follows: "It is thought best that a company be constituted here in London of persons to be selected for that purpose, and corporations to be carried on in the two cities of Derry and Coleraine, but all things concerning this plantation and undertaking to be managed and performed in Ireland by advice and direction from the company here in London." The report, containing this suggestion, which was the first germ of the Irish Society, was approved by the Common Council, and Mr. Recorder and others were [610] appointed to present the same, as the city's answer, to the Lords of the Council. This was done, and the Lords of the Council, having objected that £15,000 was too small a sum, did not accept the offer; in consequence of which, the Court of Common Council, on the 22d December, ordered that the sum of £5000 should be added to their former report, in respect of buying in of private interests and other charges, and the committees formerly appointed were required to deliver the former report, with that sum added, as their answer to the Lords of the Council. With this answer the Lords of the Council appeared to have been satisfied, and in contemplation of a final agreement, measures were very soon adopted by the city, for carrying the project into execution, on their part. On the 8th of January 1609-10, at a Common Council then held, it was enacted, granted, and agreed, that Sir Thomas Bennett and twenty-two other persons then named, and the four commissioners or viewers that were sent from the city into Ireland to view the intended place for plantation should, from time to time, meet and have conference, as well amongst themselves as with such commissioners as should be appointed by the Lords of the Council, touching the intended plantation in Ulster; and the said committees before named were to take advised care and consideration of all matters whatsoever, that to them, in their discretion, should be thought fit to be propounded, moved, or done on the behalf of the city, touching the same plantation, as the matter itself, being of that consequence and importance, did merit, and Sir Thomas Bennett was appointed to be the president of the said committees.

And it was further enacted, for the better expediting of the service, that a present taxation should be made of the said sum of £20,000, and a present levy made of one-fourth part thereof, and that the sum of £5000 [611] should be raised by way of companies of the city, and in companies by the poll, according to the rate of corn set upon every company; that some of the inferior companies were to be spared, yet such as were known able men in those companies were to be set proportionably with men of like ability in other companies, according, as in the report of the committees, confirmed by the Common Council, is mentioned; the same monies to be speedily raised, and to be paid on or before the feast of the purification next ensuing, unto Mr. Cornelius Fische, chamberlain of the city, who, by the said Court, was appointed treasurer, as well for the receipt and payment of the said £5000, as of the rest, being £15,000, when it should be required. On the following day (the 9th of January) precepts were issued for the purpose of carrying into effect the taxation and levy accordingly.

The Lords of the Council and the committees of the city soon afterwards came to an agreement. Articles were drawn up and settled; they bear date the 28th of January 1609-10, and they were approved and allowed by the Court of Common Council on the 30th of the same month; and from the course of proceeding which I have stated, it appears, that although it was at one time suggested that individuals should willingly undertake or voluntarily contribute to the undertaking, everything, at length, centered in the city, and in the Court of Common Council as representing the city: the city undertook and was to perform; the city was to provide the funds, and the city was to have the profit; the city was set in motion, by what has been called the pressure of the Crown or of the Government, and was, by its agents, the contracting party with the Government. With the companies, otherwise than as they were involved in or formed part of the general body of the city, the Crown had no negotiation or dealing. The [612] Crown did not, as it seems concern itself, either with the means by which the city was to perform its undertaking, or with the inducements to be held out to individuals, further than as such inducements were secured by the general terms of the project, and the motives and reasons presented to the city. It may reasonably be supposed, that when the Court of Common Council, in performance of the contract, found it necessary to exercise a somewhat questionable power of taxation, suggestions of some benefit to result to those upon whom the charge was imposed, would, in some manner, be made, and that such was the case is extremely probable from the nature of the transaction itself, and is apparent from the subsequent proceedings; but in the formal acts at the time, the companies are treated as the instruments by which the sums assessed or the amounts taxed should be levied, and the levies were not made upon any property of the companies, but in companies by the poll. That the levies were compulsory and enforced against reluctant parties by the power of the city, is shewn by abundant evidence in this case.

At the same Common Council by which the agreement was approved and allowed, it was ordained and enacted, that "for the better ordering, directing, and effecting of all things touching and concerning the said plantation and the business thereunto belonging, there should be a company constituted and established within the City of London," which should consist of one governor, one deputy to the governor, and twenty-four assistants; that the governor and five of the assistants should be aldermen; that Mr. Recorder should be one of the assistants, and that the deputy and the rest of the assistants should be commoners of the city; and after providing for the continuance of the company by election in the Court of Common Council, and, appointing the present members of [613] the company, it was enacted and agreed, that the company should have authority to hold Courts, and in the same to treat and determine of all matters and causes concerning the business that to them, in their discretion, should be thought fit; and also to direct, appoint, and demand what should be done or performed, on behalf of the city, touching the plantation, and to give orders and directions in England into Ireland, for the ordering and disposing of all things concerning the intended plantation, or anything belonging to the citizens of London undertaking in that part of Ireland, as also for the receiving, ordering, disposing, and disbursing of all sums of money that were or should be collected or gathered for that purpose, and generally, for any other matter incident or belonging to the business and affairs in Ulster.

This enactment or order was the practical adoption, by the City of London, of the suggestion made by the Commissioners in the preceding month of December. This company as it is called, though it was only a committee of persons appointed by the Court of Common Council, was the Irish Society previously to its incorporation, and may be conveniently distinguished by that name. It proceeded to carry into effect the agreement entered into with the Crown, and the members of the society were so far recognised by the Crown, that applications were made to them in respect of matters relating to the plantation. Thus, by an order of the Common Council, dated 7th of June 1610, it appears, that the King's Commissioners for Ireland, desired that 2000 acres of land agreed by the articles to be passed to the city, should be spared and left out of the intended assurance, to the intent that the same might be otherwise disposed of, and that Alderman Cockaine, the governor, had signified that the company [society], of themselves, [614] had not power to comply with that desire, but that the same was to be done by Act of Common Council, and had promised the Commissioners to propound the same to the next Court of Common Council then to be holden; which being done, it was ordered, that the intended assurance from His Majesty should be made for the whole quantity, according to the intent of the article, without omitting the 2000 acres in question. Again in July 1610, the King's Irish Commissioners made to the company or society four proposals, which were reported to the Common Council, by whom two of the proposals were acceded to and the other two were rejected, "in regard, it was conceived, the granting and yielding to them would prove to be very prejudicial to the city;" upon a subsequent day, one of the rejected proposals was yielded.

On the 14th of January 1610-11 an order made by the Court of Common Council affords the first formal intimation, as to the mode in which the companies of the city were to be concerned or interested in the intended plantation. After authorising the society to let the fishings for seven years, for such fine or rent as they should think fit and convenient, for the most benefit and profit of the city, it was ordered, that precepts should forthwith be sent to every several company of the city, "to require them to assemble themselves together, and to advise amongst themselves, whether they would consent and agree to take and accept of lands, in lieu of the monies already by them disbursed or to be disbursed towards the said plantation, and so to build and plant the same, at their own cost and charges accordingly, as by the printed book of the plantation was required; or else, whether they would refer the letting of the lands there, and the managing of the whole business there, unto the said governor and assistants of the [615] society for the time being; and that every company be required, by the same precept, to deliver their answer in writing on Saturday then next in the forenoon, at the Guildhall, unto the said governor and assistants, whether of the two said offers they will embrace; to the intent that the said governor and assistants, upon the answer of the several companies of the city, may make a perfect relation to the next Court of Common Council there to be holden, which was appointed to be on Monday next, touching the resolution of the several companies of the said city, to the intent that such further course might then be taken therein as should be thought fit."

In the precept which was issued in pursuance of this order, and which bears date the last day of January 1610-11, it was recited, that the King had granted unto the City of London the City of Derry and town of Coleraine, with 7000 acres of common land thereunto adjoining, and fishings, and divers other immunities, privileges, and franchisea, paying four marks per annum, and that the city had undertaken to dispend in building of houses and fortifications, and for freeing of foreign titles the sum of £20,000, and that also His Majesty had further granted to the city, divers other lands in the county of Coleraine, and other undertaken lands to build thereupon, which building was to be performed in such manner as was expressed in the printed book then extant, yet with this addition, that they were to have and enjoy the same lands after the Irish measure, being far better than other ordinary undertakers had; and then the precept proceeds as follows:—"And forasmuch as the governors and committees for the plantation in Ireland are now instantly to take care for the letting and disposing of the lands in the county of Coleraine, and other lands so undertaken, to be used and managed for the benefit [616] of this city, which would otherwise prove a great hindrance and loss, especially for that the time of the year is now most convenient for the plantation to proceed, yet it is thought fit, that the offer of those lands be first made to the several companies of this city, who have and are to disburse the same, and bear the charges of buildings before mentioned: these are therefore to charge and command you, that yourselves, together with the assistants of such other of your company as you shall think fitting, do forthwith assemble together, and advise, whether you will accept of a proportion of the same lands, according to the quantity of your disbursements, to be by you undertaken and managed, according to the printed book for plantation, or that you will refer the letting and disposing thereof to the governor and committees. And that you certify to the governor and committees, in writing under your hands, at the Guildhall, on or before the 7th day of February next coming, what shall be your full determination therein, to the end the business may the sooner be effected, wherein you are to take advertisement, that your companies are to pay and bear their proportion of the charge of the building, fortifications, and freeing of the titles, whether they accept of the said offer of the lands or no; and also, that notwithstanding the acceptance of the lands, you shall likewise still be partakers of all benefits of fishing, with the profits of the towns and other immunities whatsoever."

In consequence of these proceedings, eight of the principal, and ten of the inferior companies signified their consents to accept of the lands, to plant upon the same according to the printed book of plantation, and the other companies signified their denial; whereupon it was, on the 28th of February 1610-11, ordered, that the companies who consented should have lands allotted [617] to them, and provision was made for the event of the other companies within a fortnight, and upon further consideration, altering their minds, and consenting to accept of lands in lieu of the monies disbursed and to be disbursed by them towards the plantation in Ireland.

From these documents, it appears to have been understood, that the companies of the city had not previously undertaken the plantation, but that the plantation, being undertaken by the city, was, in default of other means, to be carried into execution by the society, or committee appointed by the city, but that it was thought desirable, that the undertaking should be, at least in part, performed by the incorporated companies; and that the city, having entered into the undertaking, having, by their power, levied the means of carrying it on, and being actually engaged in carrying it on, by their governor and committee or company, offered to each of the incorporated companies an option, either to undertake the plantation of a portion of the lands according to the printed book for plantation, or to refer the letting and disposing thereof to the governor and committees. It was an offer (which, by some of the companies, was at this time accepted) to give or allot lands, in lieu of the monies disbursed and to be disbursed towards the plantation, and the companies were informed, that whether they accepted the land or not, they were to pay and bear their proportions of the charges of buildings, fortifications and freeing titles, and that, notwithstanding their acceptance of the lands, they should be partakers of all benefits of findings, with the profits of the towns and other immunities whatsoever.

After these proceedings, the undertaking continued to be carried on by the company or society, under the control of the city: the money mentioned was levied, increased taxation, and additional levies became necessary, and were made. On the credit of them, the city advanced monies to the society, which were afterwards repaid, and the power, which the city exercised, of commitment, was frequently acted upon to compel payment of the assessments. It is to be observed, that by an order of Common Council, dated the 10th of July 1610-11, by which an additional taxation of £10,000, and a present levy of £5000 was ordered, the precept which was then ordered was to require every several company to assemble and advise among themselves, and, thereupon, certify to the governor and committee of the plantation, whether they would willingly yield to the supply of £10,000, or would be content to lose all the money they had already disbursed, and pass over their right therein to such as would undertake the payment for them, and to free and discharge them of all other payments thereafter touching the plantation.

It is apparent, that at this time, the companies were understood to have an interest in the sums they had been compelled to pay, and the Court of Common Council was probably understood to have power to declare a forfeiture.

During the time to which I have hitherto referred, no charter had been granted, but the city had proceeded, on the faith that an assurance of the land would be made to them. The lands are, in the precept of the last day of January 1610-11, mentioned as having been granted, though in fact they were not so, and on the 8th of January 1612-13 it was ordered, that Mr. William Cockayne, the first governor of the company, should be and continue governor, until the assurance from the [619] King unto the city concerning the plantation should be obtained and finished.

The charter of James was obtained soon after the date of this order. It is dated the 29th day of March 1613, and after reciting the King's intention, and that the mayor, commonalty, and citizens of London had laudably undertaken a considerable part of the plantation in Ulster, and were making progress therein, proceeds to consolidate the city and town of Derry, and all the territories and hereditaments thereby granted, into one county to be called the county of Londonderry; to declare that the City of Derry should be called Londonderry, to define the extent of the City of Londonderry and town of Coleraine, to incorporate the citizens of Londonderry and to declare, that they should have a mayor, aldermen, sheriffs and chamberlain. The mayor, commonalty, and citizens were empowered to make laws and ordinances, so that such laws and ordinances were certified by the City of Londonderry, under their common seal, to the society of the governor and assistants, London, of the new plantation in Ulster after mentioned, within four months after the making of such laws and ordinances, to the intent that the same society might ratify and confirm such great sums of money, it was generally thought fit (as a matter much importuning the advancement of the said work, [625] as well for the general satisfaction of the several companies of the city who had undertaken the same, as also for accommodating such other affairs and circumstances, as from time to time thereafter should be offered to the further consideration of that Court), that some great and worthy magistrate of the city, accompanied by some commoner of special countenance and credit, should be sent into those parts, on the behalf of the city, to take exact notice, view, and account of the whole work of plantation, and of every circumstance and thing appertaining thereunto."

Mr. Alderman Smithies, and Mr. Matthias Springham were accordingly appointed to go into Ireland, and in the meantime to confer with the governor, deputy-governor, and assistants of the Irish Society for their better instruction, and to inform themselves of the things necessary to be remembered; and authority was given to them, by the Court of Common Council, "to take an exact notice, view, and account of the plantation, and of all works and other things whatsoever done, and to be done, and of all disbursements and accounts concerning the same, as also to judge, control, place, displace, disprove, redress, reform, correct, and direct (so far as to them should seem reasonable), all persons employed for the city's use, disbursements, and service in and about the plantation, and generally to do and execute every further act which to them might be thought meet, for the better ordering and governing the plantation, and the affairs concerning the same, to the intent, that upon their return and relation of their proceedings, the Court of Common Council might grow to such final resolution touching the plantation, as should be thought fit and most convenient," and that the charges of the negotiation should be defrayed by the Irish Society, out of the general stock of the plantation.

[626] This order is remarkable, as shewing the great power, which, after the charter, the City of London exercised, and contemplated the future exercise of, over the plantation and the affairs thereof, as well as the importance which was, at that time, attached to the satisfaction which should be given to the companies. No doubt seems to have been entertained, that the society, whatever its own powers might be, would act according to the suggestions and views of the city, and that the city, whatever other objects they had to promote, were bound, in duty or in policy, to satisfy the companies. As the necessary expense was not yet defrayed, as the power of the city over the companies afforded the only means of raising the money, and as public and general objects were to be attained, it does not appear difficult to account for the conduct of the several parties.

Very full instructions appear to have been given to the commissioners, and on the 8th of November 1613 Mr. Alderman Smithies delivered the report of himself and Mr. Springham, dated the 15th of October 1613, to the Court of Common Council; and the report, after stating several abuses and negligences which had occurred, and the proceedings of the commissioners in respect thereof, and stating their opinions, that if it should stand with the liking of the city, some convenient wall of brick or stone might thereafter be made about the castle of Culmore, proceeded as follows:—"Whereas it was generally desired, that a division should be made of all the lands by and amongst the several companies undertaking in this plantation, we have, with great travail, first viewed the lands, and carefully inquired after the true value of every balliboe, and thereupon, with great care and pains, and with the assistance and advice of the gentlemen of the country, the city's agents, and surveyors, proceeded to make an equal division of the [627] land into twelve parts, wherein we have used our best skill and diligence, and have done the same as equally as possibly we could devise, the form of which division we have here brought you, together with the plot of the same. But for the City of Londonderry and the 4000 acres there, and the town of Coleraine and the 3000 acres appointed to the same, the ferries, and the fishings, we are of opinion that a division cannot be fitly made of them, but the rents and profits of them may be divided, and go amongst the several companies; and we advise that upon the division, it be provided, that where a proportion of land shall want timber to build with, the company to whose share it may fall may have sufficient timber out of the woods next adjoining, and fitting for that use, to be assigned to them by the city's agents."

This report was approved and allowed by the Common Council. That part of it which related to the division of lands was almost immediately acted upon. That part which states the opinion of the commissioners, that the rents and profits of the town lands, ferries, and fishings, might be divided and go amongst the several companies, has naturally been much dwelt upon on behalf of the Plaintiffs: what notice may have been taken of it at the time does not now appear, but in connection with it, we must bear in mind, not only that it is in perfect accordance with the precept of the last day of January 1610-11, but also that very considerable and expensive public works were still in progress; that the city was then conceived to have power to levy, compulsorily, all such monies as should be required, and that some income, of not inconsiderable amount, was at that time derived, or about to be derived from the property not then to be divided. At a time when it was thought that money could be levied by [628] taxation, whenever it was wanted, the necessity or even the propriety or prudence of reserving some property producing income to answer the general purposes of the plantation, may not have been suggested, or, if suggested, may have yielded to the greater prudence of holding out prospects of income or profit to those, upon whom the burthen was imposed, by a power, which, even if thought lawful, must have been considered as arbitrary, and was, according to the evidence, in many instances not obeyed, without reluctance on one side, and the application of force on the other.

A division of the lands by lot was effected, under the direction and superintendence of the Court of Common Council on the 17th of December 1613, and each of the twelve chief companies had allotted to it so much land, as, in quantity and value, equalled one-twelfth part of the whole of the lands to be divided, under an arrangement by which every company of the city was to have an interest or share in the divided lands, proportioned to the amount of money levied upon it for the purposes of the plantation. And this being done, an order was immediately made for a further levy as follows:—After all which done (meaning the allotment) information was given by the governor and assistants of the Irish Society, “that all the monies formerly levied towards that charge is altogether issued, and that, notwithstanding the companies had their particular shares of land which was to be managed by themselves severally, the general work for the building of the rest of the towns and fortifications was to be done at the general charge, and therefore that a further supply must, of necessity, be made and provided to proceed on the business;” and therefore it was enacted, that a present taxation should be made of the further sum of £5000, which was accordingly ordered to be levied and raised of the several com-[629]-panies of the city; and it was also ordered, that conveyances should be made of the lands allotted to the several companies, by the advice of the recorder, in such manner as the committees of the plantation (i.e., the Irish Society) should think fit.

It appears, that the companies, without waiting for their conveyances, planted and placed divers numbers of British on their proportions of lands, and expended very large sums of money thereon; but independently of these undertakings, the works which were to be done at the general charge of the city continued to be expensive, and additional sums were levied on the companies. Complaints were, about the same time, made, on the part of the Crown, that the plantation had not proceeded according to the conditions, and an intimation was given that the grant might be resumed; further time, however, was given, until the last day of August 1616. The city, in the meantime, continued its active interference, by orders of the Court of Common Council, and employed its own agents; the Irish Society seeming to act, rather in its original character of a committee of the city, than as an independent corporation.

In the year 1615 licence to hold lands in mortmain was granted to the companies, and in the course of the next or two or three following years, manors were created, and conveyances thereof and of the allotted lands were made to the companies by the Irish Society. The conveyances were absolute, in some without, and in others with, the reservation of rent to the Irish Society. The licence for the companies to hold in mortmain was also a licence to the society to convey to them, and it contained a recital that the companies, in testimony of their true obedience to the Crown, &c., had disbursed, expended, and bestowed divers great [630] sums of money for and towards the building, fortifying, planting, strengthening, and improving the City of Derry and the town of Coleraine, and some parts of other lands, and were willing and intended, so far as to them should seem convenient, to be at further charge for the planting, and improving of other lands; and for speedier proceeding therein, were desirous to have conveyances of the land they intended to build on; therefore, and to the end that the several companies might be the better encouraged and enabled to perfect and finish the intended plantation, "and in future times reap some gain and benefit of their great travails and expenses taken and bestowed therein," the licence was granted. The companies of London were thus recognized by the Crown as parties interested in the plantation, as undertakers, and after the conveyances were made, the companies may be considered as entitled to the lands allotted and conveyed to them (subject to the conditions of plantation as to particular lands), and as respectively entitled to all the profits to arise from those allotments, which (subject to the performance of those conditions), could lawfully be made. The lands not allotted, together with the ferries and fishings, remained vested in the Irish Society; and the City of London, or the Irish Society on its behalf, were bound to the performance of those general and public works, which were among the conditions of plantation; and for the purposes of those general and public works were, or were supposed to be, entitled to levy money on the companies, for whose satisfaction they, at least, professed themselves to be bound to provide.

About five or six years after the conveyances were made, further complaints were made by the Crown, that the conditions of plantation had not been performed. The complaints were laid before the Court of Common [631] Council on the 2d of June 1624; they principally regarded the general works of the plantation, but in part, the conduct of the plantation of the lands conveyed to the companies. As to the former, answer was made by the Court of Common Council; as to the latter, the subject was made known to the several companies, and, on their part, the Common Council complained, that the undertakers had been impeded by monopolies and patents of privilege contrary to the King's grant. The answer, though approved in the Court of Common Council, was, for alteration in matter of form and words of the like sense, referred to the Irish Society and others who had joined with them in drawing the answer.

Not long afterwards, and in the beginning of the reign of Charles I., the King having referred certain matters relating to the plantation to Lords Grandison, Carew, and Chichester, the Chancellor of the Exchequer did, upon their advice, require the City of London to do many things then specified, most of which were general works, but some of them affected the conduct of the companies; the Court of Common Council made answer to these requisitions, not only with respect to the general works, but also with respect to the plantation undertaken by the companies; and as to the first demand, which was that a fair new church should be built, they say, that although the work be very chargeable, and that the stocks of all the chief companies of London are already exhausted by means of the plantation, yet, in obedience to His Majesty's pleasure (the work also in itself being pious), they will forthwith give order to make preparation for erecting a fair new church, and will, so soon as conveniently they may, finish and beautify and adorn the same with seats fit and convenient.

[632] In the course of a few years afterwards, informations were filed in the Star Chamber against the City of London, the Irish Society, and certain individuals. The Defendants were charged with the deceitful and undue procuring of the charter of James, and with wilful breach of the articles agreed upon between the Lords of the Council and the committees appointed by the city on the 28th of January 1609-10, and with the wilful breach of trust which the King had reposed in them. It appears, that during the proceedings, it was insisted on by the city that they had nothing to do with the plantation, and that their name was used merely for the transaction of affairs, and for the levying of monies upon the companies for the plantation. This point was overruled, and the Court having adjudged that many offences, both of omission and commission, had been committed, inflicted upon the City of London and upon the Irish Society a fine of £70,000, and decreed, that the patent and their estates and interests should be surrendered and be brought into Court to be cancelled; and, after reciting that the greatest part of the lands were, by the society, passed over to divers companies of the city, and by them demised to their farmers, who were not Defendants to the suit, and, therefore, not liable to the censure of the Court (although in the opinion of the Court they might justly have been censured if parties), it was directed, that if the companies and their farmers should not, in pursuance of the intention of the sentence, surrender their estates, the Attorney-General should exhibit an information and bring them also to the judgment of the Court.

This decree, if lawful, entitled the Crown to recover, not only a fine of £70,000, but the possession of all the lands and hereditaments which remained vested in the Irish Society, and it was accompanied by an intima-[633]-tion, that fines, and also all the lands conveyed to the companies or demised to their farmers, might be recovered if the Attorney-General thought fit to sue for them. Steps were early taken for the execution of the decree, and proceedings were commenced against the twelve companies. In these circumstances a negotiation for money took place between the Crown and the city. The city pressed by the impending fine and forfeiture and by other charges made against them, offered a composition of £100,000. The Crown endeavoured to obtain more, and the city, acting or professing to act only for the companies, and in concurrence with them, offered to give up all the fishings, and all the lands held by the society, or by the companies, and all arrears of rent; and at length, after a protracted negotiation, the fine was ultimately compromised, and the city agreed to surrender the lands, fishings, and customs in Ireland, and to pay a sum of £12,000. Proceedings to repeal the letters patent were thereupon made available by consent or default; but afterwards, in other political circumstances, the city endeavoured to obtain relief from this oppression, and to make available, before the House of Commons, those arguments which had failed before the Court of Star Chamber. The House of Commons then advancing to the ascendancy which it soon afterwards obtained, took upon itself to pass resolutions, declaring its opinion on the judgment of the Star Chamber, and declaring its opinion of the conduct of the city and of the companies respecting the plantation. The proceeding appears to have ended in the King's expressing himself to be willing to restore the plantation to its former footing, and it was proposed to confirm the rights of the companies by Act of Parliament, but civil war supervened, and it was under the power of Cromwell that the charter and the estates derived under it were first pretended to be renewed.

[634] I have thought it right to refer to these proceedings, which were dwelt upon in the argument, as affording evidence of facts or conclusions material to be now considered, and I have read all the documents referred to; but I am of opinion, that allegations and admissions used for the purpose of defence against attempted extortion under the form of legal proceedings, or for the purpose of obtaining justice irregularly, when regularly it could not be had, ought not to be used as evidence of the rights of the parties, if the same allegations are not otherwise proved; and, undoubtedly, some of the allegations now referred to are otherwise proved. Regard must be had to such proof, but independently of such other proof and of fair inference from the facts otherwise proved, I conceive that the allegations and admissions which were made in the Star Chamber, or in the treaty which arose out of the sentence there, or in the proceedings which took place before the House of Commons, ought not in any degree to influence my judgment.

Soon after the restoration, on the 10th of April, 1662, King Charles II. granted the charter, under which the Irish Society now exists, and from which the subsisting titles to the lands and estates thereby granted are derived. This charter recites the charter of James, the grants made by the society which was constituted under that charter, and that the society retained in its own hands "such part of the tenements and hereditaments as were not properly divisible for defraying the charge of the general operation of the plantation;" it further recites, the repeal of the charter, the promise made by King Charles I. to restore the same, and that it appeared that the society and other companies of the city had expended very great sums of money in building and planting of the county of Londonderry and Coleraine, [635] and then proceeds to express that the present grant was made, to the intent that the society or some other society by the present letters patent to be created, and the companies of the City of London and their respective assigns and under-tenants might, according to their former several rights and interests therein, be restored to all the estates vested in them by force of the former letters patent; and to the intent that there might be a new society of the new plantation in Ulster, and a new incorporation of the City of Derry, and for the further and better settling and planting of the said county, towns, and places with trade and inhabitants.

This grant, therefore, is expressly made for the purpose of restoring the rights derived under the former charter; for restoring the rights and interests of the companies of London; and for further and better settling and planting the county, &c., with trade and inhabitants. The lapse of forty-nine years, and the change of circumstances, made it necessary that there should be some differences between the clauses in the charters of 1613 and 1662, and other differences may have been suggested by former experience, or by the present views and situations of the parties. They are sufficient to shew that the charter of Charles was framed with considerable care and attention, and was not a mere transcript of the charter of James.

In the charter of James, no mention was made of the companies; but the city and the society acting under the charter of James, had made conveyances to the companies, and had levied money for the general purposes of the plantation on the companies, and the intention of the charter of Charles was to restore the Irish Society, and also the companies of the City of London, to their former rights; and after making due allowance [636] for all the differences which occur, the charter of Charles appears to me to be substantially, as it was avowedly, a restoration of the charter of James. The two charters are alike in their general purview: in their general object: in the means adopted to carry that object into effect, and in the powers conferred for that purpose.

Under the new charter, new conveyances were made to the companies, and the Irish Society has ever since continued in the exclusive possession of the town lands, ferries, and fisheries, and has managed or let the same, and received and applied the rents thereof by its own authority. It has applied portions of the rents for purposes alleged to be public or charitable, and has, from time to time, stated a surplus, to be in its hands, and has paid certain sums, in respect of that surplus, to the twelve companies in equal shares. On one occasion, when money was wanting, the society applied, not to the City of London, as in the early period of its history, for further levies, but to the companies for voluntary contributions; and on another occasion, in which it became necessary to make a statement respecting the timber, it represented itself to be intrusted for the companies, and seized of a considerable salmon fishery, and other estates in the county of Londonderry, in trust for the companies of the city, over and besides the several proportions of lands which had been granted. The society have on other occasions stated themselves to be "trustees" for the companies; and there is an instance in which one is rather surprised to find them refusing to render any account to the city, and stating themselves to be accountable only to the twelve chief companies of London, to which all the surplus funds under their management not disposed of in the performance of the duties which the charter imposed upon them, were regularly transferred and paid.

[637] It does not, however, appear to me to be necessary to pursue further the history of the conduct and transactions of the society.

The society have vested in them, under a Royal charter, a very considerable property, in which they have not, collectively or individually as members of the society, any beneficial interest, and in respect of which they are invested with great powers, and have important duties to perform; in a sense, therefore, they are trustees. The property is part of that which was granted for the purposes of the plantation, and the powers possessed by the society, as well as the duties with which it is charged, have all of them reference to the plantation.

Now the objects of the plantation, and the intents and purposes thereof were of a nature partly public and political, and partly private, regarding only the interests of particular undertakers, whether corporate bodies or individuals. When the Crown treated only with individuals, and made grants to them, it imposed only conditions which were annexed to the enjoyment of the property bestowed, and the right of the Crown to enforce the conditions constituted the security which it held for the public and political objects which were contemplated.

But when it treated with the City of London, the case seems to have been varied, not by any change in the conditions imposed upon particular undertakers, but by the grant of powers and privileges which could not be bestowed on particular undertakers, and were intended to effect more important objects, to afford special means of enforcing the conditions which affected all, and special encouragements to undertakers, both in their [638] particular characters as such, and as members of the City of London, or persons enjoying the protection of the city, or partaking of the benefit of its general prosperity. The objects were such as affected the general welfare of Ireland, and the whole realm—those were the objects of the Crown: such as affected the general welfare of the City of London, those may be considered to have been the objects of the city: and such as affected the particular welfare and interests of the companies, or of individual undertakers.

The society emanated from the city, and even after its incorporation by the Crown, appears to have been little if anything more than the representative or instrument of the city for the purposes of the plantation. The city had contracted with the Crown to perform the duty, and it was at the suggestion of the city, and as the means, or as their instrument of performing the same duty, that the society was invested with the property, and with very extensive powers. The mistaken views which the society may have subsequently taken of its own situation and duties (and I think that such mistaken views have several times been taken), do not vary the conclusion to be deduced from the charter, and the circumstances contemporary with the grant of the first charter.

The duty to be performed regarded the Crown, and regarded the city, and through the city, the companies. At and long after the date of the first charter, the city had or at least was practically considered to have, and really exercised, great and extensive powers, not only over the society but over the companies; but the city in its corporate character had no beneficial interest; the money which it had advanced was early repaid, and the power which remained, or which was considered to remain, was, like that of the society, an entrusted power [639] for the benefit of the plantation and those interested in it.

Even after a large part of the territory comprised in the grant had been distributed and conveyed to the companies, much remained to be done for the general purposes of the plantation; and that which remained to be done, could not be accomplished without expence. At the time when the power of the city to raise money by taxation was not disputed, it may not have been thought necessary to retain any part of the property as a fund to support the expence, and it was reported by the commissioners on the 8th of November 1613, and probably generally understood, that the profits of the undivided hereditaments might be shared among the companies, but in 1662, when the charter of Charles was granted, and the power of the city to levy money on the companies was either no longer claimed, or was subject to very different considerations, it was recited in the charter, that the undivided property was retained to defray the expence of the general operation of the plantation. The expression was borrowed from a petition presented to the House of Commons by the City of London in January 1641, but it has its place in the charter of 1662, and must have weight accordingly.

It is said, and indeed admitted, that a dividend was made in the year 1623, and if I were at liberty to conjecture, I might perhaps suppose that the demands soon afterwards made on the city, and the difficulty of raising money, led to a conclusion that it was better to reserve the common property for the general purposes of the plantation, than to make division of its whole income, and resort to taxation and levies to defray the expences which might from time to time be required.

[640] It is clear that the general operation of the plantation was not completed at the time when the distribution of lands was made to the companies. It was indeed strongly urged in argument, that the general operation, although not then complete, was not long afterwards, or at all events was very long since, completed, and that thereupon, if not before, and in consequence thereof, the society became mere trustees for the companies: but I do not think that this Court has jurisdiction to determine the question whether the general operation of the plantation has been completed or not, and if it had, it does not appear to me that there is any satisfactory evidence on the subject, or anything to shew that operations materially affecting many important objects of the plantation and requiring expence may not still have to be performed; and if such should be the case, it does not appear to me that this Court has, on the application of the Plaintiffs, jurisdiction to inquire or give directions about such operations.

And on the whole, the question is reduced to that which was made on the motion for the payment of money into Court, and for a receiver, whether, upon the settlement made in the north of Ireland, by virtue of the charter of King James the First, under which the towns of Londonderry and Coleraine were founded, and a large tract of country granted by the Crown to the Irish Society, the terms of the grant simply constituted the Irish Society ordinary trustees for the benefit of the companies of London, or whether the grant was coupled with certain public purposes and public trusts, independently of the private benefit of the companies.

After having considered the charter of King Charles II., and the charter of King James I., and the several circumstances in evidence in this cause, which preceded [641] and accompanied the grant of the charter of King James, and having read all the documents produced in this cause, to some only of which, though at the expence of so much time, I have but shortly adverted, and having also considered the conduct of the parties under the charter for so long a series of years, I am of opinion that the powers granted to the society, and the trusts reposed in them, were, in part, of a general and public nature, independent of the private benefit of the companies of London, and were intended by the Crown to benefit Ireland and the City of London, by connecting the City of Londonderry and the town of Coleraine, and a considerable Irish district with the City of London, and to promote the general purposes of the plantation; not only by securing the performance of the conditions imposed on ordinary undertakers, but also by the exercise of powers, and the performance of trusts, not within the scope of those conditions.

The charter of Charles II. expressly recites, that the property not actually divided was retained for the general operation of the plantation; and considering that the powers given to the Irish Society for the general operation of the plantation were of a general and public or political nature—that the property remaining vested in the society is applicable towards such general operation, and that the companies of London, though interested in any surplus which may remain after the general purposes are answered, are not entitled to control the exercise of the powers which are given for general and public purposes—I do not think that this Court has jurisdiction, upon the application of the companies, to determine upon the propriety of the expenditure which has been made. It must not be inferred that I approve of some of the items of expence which were commented upon in the argument. I express no opinion upon the subject, [642] thinking that the society have a discretion, which, though controllable elsewhere, and in another manner, is not to be controlled in this Court upon such a bill as this.

And upon the whole I think that the bill must be dismissed with costs as against the Irish Society, the City of London, and the Attorney-General: without costs as against the other companies, unless it shall appear that any of the companies have opposed the claim of the Plaintiffs.
